Mr. FORDNEY. There are two in number. I think it is per stick. I will look that up. The total net laid-down cost of the item given is 82.69 cents, and it is sold at $1.50. The difference between the landed price, duty paid, all costs paid except transportation, 82.69 cents, and the price at which it is sold, $1.50, is a difference of 81 per cent.

I have a bottle of perfumery here. It is item No. 12. The total net laid-down cost, less transportation, was $2.22 for that bottle contained in that package. It sold at $4.50, or an increase of 102 per cent.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. I should like to know, when the gentleman gives the cost of these articles abroad, whether he is giving the price in their money or the price in their money reduced to its value in our money?

Mr. FORDNEY. The totals I give are reduced to our money in gold, but I give it in the invoice in their money, transferred to our money.

The next article is a cake of sandalwood bath soap, imported at 26 cents total net laid-down cost, less transportation, and sold at 50 cents, or an increase of 86 per cent.

The next article is pongee silk, an article of common use, laid down here November 9, 1921, at 59.49 cents per yard, sold at 95 cents per yard, a difference of 59.6 per cent. And let we call your attention to this important fact, that on everyone of the items that I describe here where the rate of duty is low the margin of profit—the difference between import value and selling value—is exceedingly high, and where the rate of duty is high the average margin between import price and selling price is less.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit a question for information?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is the selling price which the gentleman is giving here the wholesale or the retail selling price?

Mr. FORDNEY. The retail selling price. These were all purchased at retail.

The next item is a dozen embroidered, hemstitched linen handkerchiefs, imported at $4.34 a dozen, sold at $6 a dozen. The duty is 60 per cent and the percentage of increase is 38.2 per cent, not extreme.

The next item is a dress fabric known as dotted Swiss, an article of cotton goods, made in Switzerland, in common use in this country, imported on October 18, 1921, at 72 cents, sold for $2, percentage of increase 177 per cent.

Next is a piece of dress goods, known as Japanese crêpe, imported at 18.77 cents per yard and sold at 50 cents, an increase of 166 per cent, all items of cost included.

The next item is a dress fabric, known as embroidered organdie, costing $1.24 per yard, all items of cost included, sold at $4 a yard, an increase of 220 per cent.

A case of needles, an article of very common necessity, imported from England May 13, 1921, for 50 cents, sold at $1.35, a difference of 169 per cent.

Another article of needles, imported at 44.49 cents per case, sold at $1, an increase of 125 per cent.

Another article, glass-headed pins, imported from Germany. By the way, your wife can not go out to a store in this country and buy an American-made pin. My wife said she tried it in many stores, and they told her there were none. These pins were imported at 1.8 cents per package and sold at 5 and 10 cents a package. When sold at 5 cents the increase is 175 per cent, and when sold to my wife down town here at 10 cents the difference is 725 per cent.

Another article is hairpins. Some of you bachelors know little about them, but married men understand them; imported at 1.18 cents per package, sold at 5 cents, an increase of 332 per cent. That is not all profit. Out of that must come the overhead cost of selling, which in some instances averages 25 to 30 per cent when it is extremely high.

Another of the same kind of hairpin, imported at 1.9 cents, sold at 5 cents, an increase of 157 per cent.

I have in this package here some china plates, imported on October 17, 1921, brought in from England, chinaware, all items of cost laid down in this country on the counter in the store for 18 cents, sold for 54 cents, an increase of 198 per cent.

Here I have another plate imported March 20, 1921, at a cost of 25.7 cents, sold for 79 cents, a difference of 207 per cent. Out of that must come the selling cost.

Another china plate was imported November 7, 1921, from France at a cost of 17.6 cents, sold at 75 cents, an increase of 324 per cent.

Human-hair nets, such as are known as ladies' invisible hair nets, imported from China, laid down all costs paid, transportation and everything else except the selling cost, at 6.6 cents, sold at 50 cents, an increase of 652 per cent.

Another hair net of the same kind, but of a little different cost, imported at 4.6 cents, sold at 50 cents, an increase of 976 per cent.

Another hair net, imported November 12, 1921, at 2.9 cents, sold at 35 cents, an increase of 1,104 per cent.

Another hair net, total laid down cost 2.8 cents, sold at 35 cents, a difference of 1,126 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. All bought from the same firm?
Mr. FORDNEY. All bought from the same firm.
Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.
Mr. OLDFIELD. How many of these articles are produced in this country? Has the gentleman information on that?
Mr. FORDNEY. No; I have not. I do not know.
Mr. OLDFIELD. Of course, it seems to me the gentleman has made out a strong case against profiteering in these particular articles.
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. OLDFIELD. I was wondering how many of them are made in this country and whether manufacturers in this country are charging as high prices as these importers are charging?
Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know; but I can say this to my good friend, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], whom you all know, a gentleman whose word I would take anywhere, any hour of the day or night, has just returned three days ago from Kansas City, and he says that while there he visited a large department store in Kansas City which he said would do credit to the city of New York or Chicago.
Mr. ELLIS. He is entirely right about that.
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I believe it. He said the proprietor, when introduced to him, finding him a Congressman from Connecticut, said, "TILSON, here are goods on my shelves purchased from New England States, but I can no longer purchase goods from New England States." "Why?" asked Mr. TILSON. He said, "Because my competitor is purchasing foreign-made goods at such a low price and sells them below the price I can purchase American-made goods for, and so I must stop and deal in foreign goods."
Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to say that I am in thorough sympathy with the American valuation proposition. I have in mind a suggestion that the gentleman did not mention the matter of musical instruments. I read in a trade journal that musical instruments made in Germany were being put down in England and America at 33⅓ per cent of the price for which they could be produced in England and America.

To confirm that statement I can say that a manufacturing concern in Baltimore whose common stock was selling at 65 last year, the preferred stock bearing 7 per cent interest, is now down to 12 per cent, and if the American valuation proposition is not adhered to you are going to put out of business American manufacturers in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank my friend for the statement. Now, I received a letter from a firm in Cleveland, Ohio—the Cleveland Woolen Goods Co. The gentleman states in his letter that there was an article published in a Cleveland paper by a Chicago house in which they stated that English-made overcoating which was selling at $12.30 a yard they would be obliged to sell at $17.60 a yard, if the American valuation plan was adopted, or adding $5.30 per yard because of the American valuation.

There is only one reason for that; that is, if they are undervaluing, we will catch them at it on the American plan. We can not do it on the foreign valuation. This firm sent me a sample of the overcoat cloth, a Scotch plaid which they are making and which they say is a better grade than the English goods about which they write, and state that the Chicago firm advertised this in a Cleveland paper, and they are selling their goods at less than $3 a yard.

Now, I must be a little mite personal. I have been personally attacked by these people. They say that less than 10 per cent of their business is done on imported articles. I have their letterhead right here showing that they have a wholesale and retail department in Chicago and a retail and wholesale house in New York. They have 3 houses in the United States. They have 4 foreign houses in the Orient—2 in Japan, 1 in China, 1 in Manila, and 8 in Europe—12 foreign houses and 3 in the United States, and yet only 10 per cent of their business is in foreign-made goods.
Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do the profits that the gentleman has given here represent the profits of the retailer, or has the retailer purchased them through some other agency?
Mr. FORDNEY. In nearly every instance their own invoices covering the importation of identical or comparable articles were found, and I have information taken from those invoices.
Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. I will.
Mr. CRISP. I know my friend is always fair. The gentleman's last statement that Marshall Field Co. had these different places in foreign countries and had only three in this country, and says it is absurd that only 10 per cent of the business was imported goods—I am sure the gentleman will agree that that only refers to the amount of business done in the United States.
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I pointed out that they have 3 houses in the United States and 12 abroad, undoubtedly for the purchase of foreign-made goods to bring here and sell in the United States.
Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan did not state in the same connection, as a fair man ordinarily would——
Mr. FORDNEY. I have tried to be fair.
Mr. MANN. I doubt that. I have great regard for the gentleman from Michigan, but I do not think he is trying to be fair. The gentleman from Michigan did not state that Marshall Field & Co. have almost 30 manufacturing establishments in the United States which they own.
Mr. FORDNEY. I am giving you what they have on their letterhead. I referred to that and made no further statement. I do not know how many factories they have in the United States. When they sell their goods to American citizens they should purchase these goods here and give employment to people that they expect to do business with here. How much do they sell abroad? In selling imported goods to American citizens they deprive American labor of employment.
Mr. MANN. They employ more American citizens than any firm in the United States outside of corporations, like the great Steel Corporation.
Mr. FORDNEY. I would not have mentioned the name if I had not been requested to. There is no backwardness on their part in mentioning my name and criticizing me severely. They say that I have a very convenient mind for not remembering the truth. That comes pretty close to calling a man a liar. [Laughter.] Here is the letterhead with their houses advertised upon it, and that is what I call attention to.
Let us leave Marshall Field & Co. for a moment now until I refer to this piece of chinaware, which I have in my hand, imported from Japan. The wholesale selling value per dozen in Japan for this cup and saucer is 48 sen. A sen is a half cent, so that makes this 24 cents a dozen, being a cent for each cup and saucer. I did not buy this cup and saucer from Marshall Field & Co.; they were purchased down town yesterday. They are recognized as comparable articles. They were imported through the port of Philadelphia a short time ago at the price I give you, and were sold at $4.20 a dozen.
Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. KING. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the factory that made that cup and saucer is financed by American money or not?
Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know.
Mr. KING. Or is it Japanese?
Mr. FORDNEY. It does not make any difference whether it is American or foreign capital. If those goods were entered in the port of Philadelphia at that price, one of two things is true: When they were sold for $4.20 a dozen the merchant who did that is either a profiteer or a perjurer, because if he entered the articles at less than he paid for them, then he is a perjurer, and if he enters them at the correct value, he is more than a profiteer when he sells them at $4.20 a dozen. [Applause.]
Mr. KING. I agree with the gentleman.
Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. OLDFIELD. It seems that about the only way to catch that fellow would be by an excess-profits tax.
Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; by an American valuation tax, and then we would catch him on the taxes. Here is another article which I hold in my hand—a rule. The Lufkin Rule Co. is an organization in my home town, Saginaw, Mich. They make all kinds of measuring sticks, tapes, instruments of every description for measuring. Before the war they had established a house in Germany to take care of the foreign trade. They lost that house when the war broke out. The Germans are operating that plant to-day. The cost in my home town one week ago on Monday, given me in that factory, which I visited, was $2.10 a dozen for this article, and the Germans are laying the same article down to-day here for $1 a dozen. We must have at least 50 per cent ad valorem on an American valuation or that firm in my town, with $3,000,000 invested in the plant, must close its doors.

Mr. COPLEY. How many workmen would it put out of business?

Mr. FORDNEY. From two to three thousand are employed in that factory; 600 were employed when I was there a week ago.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman stated these extravagant profits apparently made by this firm in Chicago upon the basis of the Underwood tariff law, the existing law, as I understand it?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is the foreign valuation. I am not attacking the existing law. I am talking about the foreign valuation, and I am attacking it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The figures the gentleman stated are necessarily based upon existing law?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the gentleman's contention that if the American valuation were put into effect the cost of these commodities to the consumers who patronize that firm would be still increased or lowered?

Mr. FORDNEY. My God, man, where on this pocketknife they have made a profit of 3,900 per cent, what sense would there be in increasing it? [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; they will not let the consumer have the benefit of it. That is what I am showing by my argument, that, no matter what they purchase those goods abroad for, the consumer pays the bill, and pays a profit beyond all reason.

Mr. COPLEY. Then, too, increasing the price to the importer would give an opportunity for American manufacturers to compete, and that would bring in competition which would tend to reduce the cost to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Let me give an illustration of the difference in assessing ad valorem duties on the foreign valuation and on the American valuation. I will take, for illustration, an article that pays 25 per cent ad valorem duty. The correct rate of duty on American valuation for that article, not considering transportation and profit, would be 20 per cent. The ad valorem duties in existing law operate against the country of the highest cost of production. Let me show you why and how. Suppose we were to purchase an article in Canada that cost $1,000 on which the duty is 25 per cent. The duty to be paid then would be $250, so that the price of the article laid down in the United States, duty paid, would be $1,250. You and I know that we can purchase that article in Europe for much less money than we pay in Canada, because the cost of production in Canada is higher. Canada is the best customer the United States has, based on population, and her cost of production is nearer our cost of production than that of any other country in the world. Suppose we purchase the article in Europe for $800 with a duty of 25 per cent, or $200. The European will lay that article down in the United States, duty paid, for $1,000. The Canadian article of the same kind costs $1,250 laid down here, duty paid. We all know that we can purchase that article in the Orient, if it is made there, for not more than $400, which, with 25 per cent duty, would add $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield me 15 minutes more?

Mr. MONDELL. Will 15 minutes be sufficient?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank you.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish this statement. This article laid down from Canada costs $1,250, from Europe $1,000, from the Orient $500. Under American valuation the assumption is that the landed value is $1,250, because that is what is put on to offset the difference in cost in the highest cost production country. Canada would still pay $250 at 20 per cent on $1,250, Europe would have to pay $250, or 20 per cent on $1,250; the Orient would pay $250, or 20 per cent, on $1,250 American valuation. They would all pay the same amount of duty on the same article. That is the difference, gentlemen, between them. [Applause.]

Among the many false and misleading statements made by the opponents to the American valuation plan is that the American manufacturer will have it in his power to advance his selling price and consequently the amount of duty to be collected upon similar imported merchandise so as to prohibit the importation of such goods.

Exactly the contrary is true. The American valuation plan acts as an automatic check against this very supposed danger. Let me illustrate: If an American-made article is at the present time selling for $1 and the landed cost of the foreign article is 80 cents, the duty required to offset the difference would be 20 per cent upon the American value, so that the foreign value of the foreign article 80 cents, plus 20 cents, equals the American selling price of $1, and brings the foreign article on a competitive basis with the domestic article.

Now, suppose an American manufacturer or group of manufacturers would get together and agree to make their new selling price $2, so as to compel the foreigner to pay more duty and reap a greater profit himself, we can at a glance see how futile this would be. The rate of duty remaining the same, namely 20 per cent, based on the new price of $2 would compel the importer to pay 40 cents duty instead of 20 cents is true. The foreign value still remains 80 cents. Added to this, the duty of 40 cents brings the landed cost of the foreign article to $1.20 as against the American price of $2, giving the foreign article an advantage of 80 cents in the market.

It is such a simple proposition that it would seem impossible that any reasonable mind could be deceived by such argument; should the American manufacturer be so inclined it would be suicidal for him to attempt it.

It discriminates against no country in the world. Now, wait a minute. I have here an article from "The Manufacturer" for December, a well-known magazine of Philadelphia, and they claim that the figures were based on figures given out by the National Retail Dry Goods Association. They have here the wholesale selling value and the retail selling value of articles of common use, and it is most astounding. Now, let me call your attention to it.

The article referred to is as follows:

There have been some very interesting figures put out during this campaign of the Importers and Traders Association which, when analyzed, show some extremely interesting facts. The following table, worked out from data published by this organization, is interesting and speaks for itself:

	Foreign purchase price.	Foreign price plus duty.	Wholesale selling price as given.	Retail selling price as given.
Val lace, 10-yard piece	$0.057	$0.091	$0.29	$0.44
Cutlery, case of 4 scissors	.87	1.13	2.58	3.87
Hair brushes	.708	.936	2.45	3.67
Pins, a paper	.022	.027	.05	.07
Colored printed linen handkerchiefs	.18	.288	.44	.66
Woolen dress goods, tweed, yard	.72	.97	2.69	4.04
Flowers and feathers, each	.053	.084	.27	.40
Feather-trimmed hats	3.01	4.82	15.27	22.91
Hand-embroidered nightgowns	1.99	3.18	5.80	8.70
Jointed dolls	.376	.507	1.30	1.95
Children's cotton hose	.47	.705	1.13	1.70
Men's cotton hose	.33	.50	.80	1.20
Short kid gloves, women's	.59	.84	1.69	2.54
Women's cotton gloves	.143	.214	.44	.66
Linen tablecloths	2.24	3.02	4.64	6.96
Damask napkins, dozen	3.48	4.70	5.44	8.16
Linen towels	.249	.336	.38	.57
Linen for dresses, yard	.59	.796	1.16	1.74

The Woman's Consumers' Committee of New York, made up of importers' wives and others, following the same list of items, gave the present retail prices corresponding with the fourth column above, and in parallel columns give what they claim will be the increased retail price caused by the Fordney bill based upon American valuation, as follows:

	Reported present retail price.	Arbitrarily fixed advance retail price.
Val lace, 10-yard piece	$0.44	$0.85
Cutlery, case of 4 scissors	3.87	5.31
Hair brushes	3.67	5.85
Pins, a paper	.07	.10
Colored printed linen handkerchiefs	.66	.90
Woolen dress goods, tweed, yard	4.04	4.92
Flowers and feathers, each	.40	.81
Feather-trimmed hats	22.91	45.54
Hand-embroidered nightgowns	8.70	11.19
Jointed dolls	1.95	3.26
Children's cotton hose	1.70	2.06
Men's cotton hose	1.20	1.46
Short kid gloves, women's	2.54	4.41
Women's cotton gloves	.66	1.07
Linen tablecloths	6.96	8.07
Damask napkins, dozen	8.16	9.31
Linen towels	.57	.67
Linen for dresses, yard	1.74	2.05

The actual facts, however, are indicated in the following table, using the rates of the Fordney bill, but basing those rates upon the wholesale selling price as given by the importers, which wholesale rate, however, can hardly be considered a fair base, because in some cases a profit of more than 200 per cent over the landed cost is indicated, but even basing this calculation upon their own figures reveals a bad enough condition.

	Actual additional amount of duty based on propagandists' wholesale price.	Actual arbitrary additions made to retail selling price.	Percentage of profit from additional assumed price.
			Per cent.
Val lace, 10-yard piece	$0.10	$0.42	320
Cutlery, case of 4 scissors	.51	1.44	180
Hair brushes	.61	2.18	257
Pins, a paper	.01	.03	200
Colored printed linen handkerchiefs	.05	.24	380
Woolen dress goods, tweed, yard	.55	.88	60
Flowers and feathers, each	.09	.41	355
Feather trimmed hats	5.07	22.63	546
Hand-embroidered nightgowns	.98	2.49	154
Jointed dolls	.26	1.31	404
Children's cotton hose	.16	.36	125
Men's cotton hose	.12	.26	117
Short kid gloves, women's	.38	1.93	407
Women's cotton gloves	.05	.41	720
Linen tablecloths	.52	1.11	113
Damask napkins, dozen	.31	1.35	335
Linen towels	.02	.10	400
Linen for dresses, yard	.12	.31	158

On the item of laces, linen, per piece, foreign value, 5.7 cents; duty paid, 9.1; wholesale price, 29; retail price, 44 cents. Cutlery, 4 scissors. I will not name the first. The price, duty paid, was 1.13; retail price, 3.87. Hair brushes, 95.6; retail price, 3.67. Pins, per paper, 2.7 cents; average retail price, 7 cents. Colored print, linen handkerchiefs, 28, duty paid, all costs, all items of cost, sold 66 cents. Woolen dress goods, per yard, 97 cents; retail, $4.04 per yard.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In order we may know who is the bigger profiteer, will not the gentleman give the wholesale and the retail price and the cost?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. This particular article, imported, duty paid, 97 cents; wholesale, $2.69; retail, $4.04.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They divided it 50–50?

Mr. FORDNEY. Flowers and artificial feathers for ladies' hats. Eight, wholesale, 27; retail, 40. Now listen, please, you married men: Feather-trimmed ladies' hats, foreign value, $3.03; duty paid, $4.82; wholesale value, $15.27; retail, $22.91. The importers say that if the American valuation is put into effect they must receive for those hats $45.54. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do they give any reason why they should receive that amount?

Mr. FORDNEY. Because it will increase the duty, and they say it is price fixing. If there is anything in the world it does not do it is not price fixing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much would that increase the duty? They claim it increases it such a fabulous amount.

Mr. FORDNEY. The rates in the bill as it passed the House are practically identical with the rates in the Payne law on the foreign value, and the difference that the importer would pay would be this: He would be obliged to pay the duty on its correct landed value, whereas under the foreign value, if he undervalued, he is robbing Uncle Sam just that much.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the customer gets it no cheaper?

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I heard some of the extraordinary figures given by the gentleman just now as to the import price and retail price of ladies' hats. Will the gentleman please tell us where he got those figures?

Mr. FORDNEY. I stated it. I said I got them from The Manufacturer, a publication of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia. I do not believe they would publish the data unless it is correct. I believe if they are correct in one statement they are correct in all.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just one moment, and then I will yield. Here is another article. Hand-embroidered nightgowns, foreign price, $1,99; wholesale selling value, $5.80; $3.18 duty paid; $5.80 wholesale, $8.70 retail on article costing $1.99 abroad. Now, one other article. I have several of them here. Here is an article, foreign value $0.59, retail price $1.74. The article sold abroad for $3.48, retail $8.16 here.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman tell how much duty was paid on that article?

Mr. FORDNEY. Brother, I can not give it on that. I do give it on all the samples I have here, but I did not look it up on this that I have just mentioned.

Now, gentlemen, permit me to say that these big department houses are making more noise about the American valuation than any others. And I am prompted to give you an illustration, one given by the great evangelist, Sam Jones. Once upon a time he was lecturing in Chicago and criticized the ministers of that city for not paying more attention to the poor devil on the outside than they did to just their little congregations. On the following Sunday a bishop of one of the churches answered Sam Jones and severely criticized him. The following Monday evening Jones replied briefly to the bishop and said, in conclusion, "When I see a pack of dogs in the street and shy a stone at them I assume the dog that does the yelping is the one that I hit." [Laughter.] Now, let these department houses come on. I say to them that there is only one valid reason they can have in opposing American valuation.

Let me say it will not change the rate of duty on the article at all nor the amount of duty that those goods should and would pay if that importer paid his honest dues to Uncle Sam. Their only valid reason can be, my friends, that the American valuation is a sure bar to undervaluation, the thing of greatest benefit to the importer.

I have given you the cases in one office alone in New York, not of undervaluation but of revaluation. We have an antidumping bill which Congress passed in May last, and, as I have shown you, 3,200 cases were discovered in the customhouse in New York alone, and not in one single instance has the antidumping bill been applied. Somebody is to blame. If I were President of the United States or Secretary of the Treasury I would get a new broom and I would begin sweeping. [Applause.] I would fill these offices with men who would enforce the law. There is where our trouble lies right now.

My friends, our imports are very heavy. For the 11 months of 1921 our imports, in round numbers, are $2,200,000,000 and our exports $4,100,000,000. Those imports were based upon foreign valuation, and if the actual truth were known, in my candid opinion, as to the value of those imported goods, the imports for the 11 months of this year in quantity would have far exceeded our exports, because of the undervaluation and low cost of production abroad, of which I have given you examples. Those things, my friends, are worthy of consideration.

As my time is limited, let me read you an extract from an English newspaper dated October 3, 1921, as follows:

The present position of the tariff is that it is held up for revision and will not come up again until January or February, 1922.

How correct they were!

And then, if at all, in a very modified form.

I think in that they are mistaken.

In the meantime public opinion in America is steadily growing against the tariff. It is very important, the delegates say, that all industries in this country should examine the new tariff closely and get in touch with the consumers of their goods in America, and should see that the propaganda that has been so successfully launched should not be allowed to die out.

Mr. Chairman, I have a whole lot more that I want to say and which I think is important, but as my time is limited I will print it.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman is very wise, and, I understand, very close to the administration. How soon, in the gentleman's opinion, may we expect a new broom in the Treasury Department?

Mr. FORDNEY. I understand that the Senate is quite likely to confirm to-day the appointment of Mr. Dover, of Takoma, Wash., a former resident of Ohio, as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who will have charge of the customs. That is a step in the right direction and at the right time. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let me say that the controversy between the foreign and American system of valuation is not so much one between the merits of the method as it is between honest and dishonest valuation. It is a fight between American industries and foreign industries, unquestionably, as to which shall occupy the markets of the United States. Between American labor and foreign labor which, in days of stress, shall be employed or who shall walk the streets, gentlemen? Between, in these days, the American home and the foreign home, which shall and which shall not be prosperous and contented? Therefore let all who are for foreign industry, foreign labor, foreign homes stand for the foreign plan. Let all who are for America and who are for American industry, American labor, and American homes stand for the American plan and America. [Applause].

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, because I have not had time to complete my statement on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. In connection with each exhibit to which I have referred I have the following information pertaining to an identical or comparable article:

1. The entry number.
2. The date of entry.
3. The consular invoice number.
4. Date and place of consulation.
5. Invoice description.
6. Foreign value or purchase price set forth in invoice in foreign currency.
7. Foreign value or purchase price converted into United States gold.
8. Dutiable value in United States gold.
9. Rate of duty.
10. Amount of duty.
11. All nondutiable elements of cost that appear on the invoice.
12. Total net laid-down price, less in some instances transportation costs not appearing on invoice.
13. The retail selling price.
14. The difference between cost and selling price.
15. The percentage of increase.

For the purpose of clearness and brevity I shall omit some of the details regarding price in foreign currency, the rate of exchange, and so forth, and shall give prices only in United States gold.

The first exhibit is a lip stick imported from France:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 16, 1921.
French selling price, $0.51683.
Duty 60 per cent ad valorem, $0.31001.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.30001.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.82694.
Retail selling price, less war tax, $1.50.
Difference, $0.67306.
Percentage of increase, 81 per cent.

This exhibit was purchased by an examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in Chicago in substantial quantities from France. The examiner positively identified this exhibit as being identical with certain other lip sticks imported by the firm in question.

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 24, 1920.
French selling price, $1.3727 per bottle.
Rate of duty, 40 cents a pound and 60 per cent ad valorem on contents and 45 per cent ad valorem on bottles; amount of duty, $0.8325 per bottle.
All nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.017245.
Total net laid-down cost, less transportation, $2.222445.
Retail selling price, less war tax, $4.50.
Difference, $2.277555.
Percentage of increase, 102 per cent.

This exhibit was purchased by a customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, arriving in substantial quantities from France, and which is representative of the less expensive grades of French perfumes. The examiner positively identified this exhibit as being identical with certain other perfumes imported by the firm in question.

The third exhibit is a cake of sandalwood bath soap imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, April 5, 1921.
English selling price, $0.20498 per cake.
Duty, 30 per cent ad valorem, $0.061494.
All nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000931.
Total net laid-down cost, less transportation, $0.2674.
Retail selling price, $0.50.
Difference, $0.2326.
Percentage of increase, 86 per cent.

This sample was purchased by a customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in substantial quantities from England. He positively identifies the exhibit as being identical with certain other sandalwood bath soap imported by the firm in question. This is the same article sold in a store in this city, December 14, at 50 cents.

The fourth exhibit is pongee silk imported from Japan:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 9, 1921.
Price in Japan, $0.385854.
Entered value, $0.461396.
Duty, 45 per cent, $0.2076282.
All nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.00144.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.59492.
Selling price per yard, $0.95.
Difference per yard, $0.35508.
Percentage of increase, 59.6 per cent.

This exhibit was purchased by a customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise arriving at Chicago in large quantities. The examiner positively identified the sample as being identical and comparable in all respects with certain other pongee silk imported by the firm in question.

The fifth exhibit is an embroidered, hemstitched linen handkerchief imported from Switzerland:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, February 15, 1921.
Swiss selling price, $2.587 per dozen.
Duty, 60 per cent ad valorem, $1.55226.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.2032.
Total net laid-down cost, $4.34246.
Selling price per dozen, $6.
Difference, $1.65754.
Percentage of increase, 38.2 per cent.

The purchase of this sample was made by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in Chicago in large quantities. The sample is positively identified by the examiner as being in all respects comparable with other embroidered, hemstitched linen handkerchiefs covered by the invoice above mentioned.

An explanatory statement accompanied this sample. The date and place of consultation were January 18, 1921, St. Gall, Switzerland. Since that time the foreign market value of this particular handkerchief has depreciated from approximately 16 Swiss francs per dozen to 9 francs per dozen. The present-day replacement cost of this handkerchief would be very materially less than the amount shown.

The sixth exhibit is a dress fabric known as dotted Swiss, and was imported from Switzerland:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
Swiss selling price, $0.559912.
Dutiable value, $0.59453.
Duty 25 per cent ad valorem, plus 7 cents a pound, $0.15447.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.00644.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.720822.
Retail selling price, $2.
Difference, $1.279178.
Percentage of increase, 177 per cent.

The seventh exhibit is a piece of dress fabric known as Japanese crêpe, imported from Japan:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING INDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 17, 1921.
Japanese selling price, $0.16129 per yard.
Dutiable value, $0.17238.
Duty 15 per cent, $0.025857.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000739.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.18788 per yard.
Retail selling price, $0.50 per yard.
Difference, $0.31212.
Percentage of increase, 166 per cent.

Exhibit 8 is a sample of dress fabric known as embroidered organdie, imported from Switzerland:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
Swiss selling price, $0.77446.
Duty 60 per cent, $0.464676.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.007841.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $1.246977.
Retail selling price, $4 a yard.
Difference, $2.753023.
Percentage of increase, 220 per cent.

The exhibits of dress fabrics, which I have given as 6, 7, and 8, namely, dotted Swiss, Japanese crêpe, and embroidered organdie, were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on classes of merchandise indicated by the samples which arrive in Chicago in large quantities. The examiner positively identifies the samples as being comparable in all respects and identical in quality with other dress fabrics imported by the department store in question, and covered in the entries of October 17, 1921, and October 18, 1921, above mentioned.

Exhibit 9 is a case of needles imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, May 13, 1921.
English selling price, $0.417825 per case.
Duty, 20 per cent, $0.08356.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000305.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.50169.
Retail selling price, $1.35.
Difference, $0.84831.
Percentage of increase, 169 per cent.

Exhibit 10 is a case of needles imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, May 13, 1921.
English selling price, $0.370525.
Duty 20 per cent, $0.074105.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000271.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.4449 per case.
Retail selling price, $1.
Difference, $0.551.
Percentage of increase, 125 per cent.

Exhibits 9 and 10 were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise which arrives in substantial quantities from England. He positively identifies the samples as being identical with other needle cases imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of May 13, 1921, above mentioned.

Exhibit 11 is a cube of steel, glass-headed pins, imported from Germany:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
German selling price, $0.015768 per cube.
Duty 15 per cent, $0.0023652.
Total net laid-down price, excluding transportation, $0.01813.
Retail selling price, $0.05.
Difference, $0.03187.
Percentage of increase, 175 per cent.

This article is sold in some stores at 10 cents, an increase of 350 per cent.

Exhibit 12 is a cube of steel, glass-headed pins of smaller size than exhibit 11, imported from Germany:

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
German selling price, $0.010356 per cube.
Duty, 15 per cent, $0.001553.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.0119.
Retail selling price, $0.025.
Difference, $0.0131.
Percentage of increase, 110 per cent.

Exhibits 11 and 12 were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise. He positively identifies the samples as being identical with certain other pins imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of October 18, 1921, above mentioned.

Exhibit 13 is a package of Corona hairpins imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, May 16, 1921.
English selling price, per package, $0.009867.
Duty, 20 per cent, $0.001973.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.0000023.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.0118435.
Retail selling price, $0.05.
Difference, $0.03816.
Percentage of increase, 322 per cent.

Exhibit 14 is another package of Corona hairpins imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, May 16, 1921.
English selling price, per package, $0.0161637.
Duty, 20 per cent, $0.0032327.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.00003771.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.0194002.
Retail selling price, $0.05.
Difference, $0.0306.
Percentage of increase, 157 per cent.

Exhibits 13 and 14 were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in substantial quantities from England. The samples are positively identified by the examiner as being identical with certain other hairpins imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of May 16, 1921, mentioned above.

Exhibit 15 is a china plate imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 17, 1921.
English selling price, per plate, $0.112485.
Duty, 40 per cent, $0.04994.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.006263.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.181053.
Retail selling price, $0.54.
Difference, $0.35894.
Percentage of increase, 198 per cent.

Exhibit 16 is another china plate imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, March 20, 1921.
English selling price, $0.18181 per plate.
Duty, 40 per cent, $0.07272.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.002476.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.257.
Retail selling price, $0.79.
Difference, $0.533.
Percentage of increase, 207 per cent.

Exhibit 17 is a china plate imported from France:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 7, 1921.
French selling price, $0.10675 per plate.
Duty, 55 per cent, $0.06936.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000632.
Total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, $0.176742.
Retail selling price, $0.75.
Difference, $0.573258.
Percentage of increase, 324 per cent.

Exhibits 15, 16, and 17 were purchased by the examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in substantial quantities from England and France. The examiner positively identifies the samples as being identical with certain other plates imported by the department store in question and covered in entries of March 20, October 17, and November 7, 1921, above mentioned.

Exhibit 18 is a woman's human-hair net imported from China, size 12 by 28, double mesh:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 12, 1921.
Chinese selling price, $0.04768 per net.
Duty, 35 per cent, $0.016688.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.00209.
Total net laid-down cost, $0.06645.
Retail selling price, $0.50.
Difference per net, $0.443355.
Percentage of increase, 652 per cent.

Exhibit 19 is also a hair net imported from China:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 12, 1921.
Chinese selling price, $0.032854.
Duty, 35 per cent, $0.0119989.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.00158.
Total net laid-down cost, $0.046433.
Retail selling price, $0.50.
Difference, $0.453567.
Percentage of increase, 976 per cent.

Exhibit 20 is another hair net imported from China:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 12, 1921.
Chinese selling price, $0.020321.
Duty, 35 per cent, $0.0071135.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.001634.
Total net laid-down cost, $0.029068.
Retail selling price, $0.35.
Difference, $0.320932.
Percentage of increase, 1,104 per cent.

Exhibit 21 is another hair net imported from China:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, November 12, 1921.
Chinese selling price, $0.0205723.
Duty, 35 per cent, $0.007003.
Nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000958.
Total net laid-down cost, $0.028533.
Retail selling price, $0.35 per net.
Difference, $0.321467.
Percentage of increase, 1,126 per cent.

These hair nets, Exhibits 18, 19, 20, and 21, were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, arriving in enormous quantities by registered parcel post from China. The four exhibits are positively identified by this examiner as being comparable in all respects with certain other similar woman's human-hair nets imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of November 12, 1921. The entry mentioned consisted entirely of woman's human-hair nets and covered 212,256 hair nets.

The cost of postage and of the tissue liner is included in the entered value, but the cost of an American envelope plus labor cost of inserting the net in the envelope is not included in the tabulation.

The opponents to increased import duties contend that they will result in increased prices. On the exhibits I have been able to secure, the percentage of increase of selling price over cost ranges from 38.2 per cent to 1,126 per cent. It is my contention the importer desires first to displace the American-made article, and, second, to exact as high a profit as the market will permit. The importers' inference is that the consumer gets the benefit of a low duty.

It is interesting to note that on the hemstitched linen handkerchief imported from Switzerland—this is a luxury—the duty is 60 per cent and the percentage of increase is 38.2 per cent.

On the pongee silk there is a duty of 45 per cent, and the margin of increase is 59.6 per cent.

On the perfumery, distinctly a luxury, the duty is 60 per cent, plus 40 cents per pound, and the margin of increase is 102 per cent.

On the Japanese crêpe, a dress fabric of common usage, the duty is 15 per cent and the percentage of increase 166 per cent.

On the dotted Swiss, also a dress fabric of common usage, the duty is 25 per cent and 7 cents per pound, and the increase of selling price over cost is 177 per cent.

There is a 20 per cent duty on needles, and the margin of increase on one exhibit is 125 per cent and on the other 169 per cent.

On the glass-headed pins, with a duty of but 15 per cent, the margin of increase on one exhibit is 110 per cent and on the second exhibit 175 per cent.

On hairpins the duty is 20 per cent, and on one exhibit the margin of increase is 157 per cent and on the other 322 per cent.

On the Chinese hair net, an article of common usage, the duty is 35 per cent, and the margin of profit on the four exhibits ranges from 652 per cent to 1,126 per cent.

I submit this as evidence that the importer is not free from mercenary instincts, and that his motive is devoid of concern for the consumer. With low duties his profits increase. He has figured it out time and time again.

Information contained in the importer's invoice is seldom open to the public. There may be some question regarding the propriety of my giving out this information here to-day. To my mind, however, information of this kind is of tremendous public interest.

Competitive products are coming upon the American market at far less than the American cost of production, with the result that many American manufacturing institutions are idle and many American citizens are out of employment. Congress is endeavoring to write a tariff law and the declared object is to protect American industries, and our efforts are being opposed chiefly by importers, whose interest is not in the furnishing of employment to labor in American manufacturing establishments but in unloading upon the American market at tremendous profits the product of the poorly paid labor of foreign countries.

The department store in which all the exhibits I have were purchased contends that with American valuation they will be obliged to advance their prices. They are appealing in every conceivable manner to the consumer. Their whole argument seems to be that the American manufacturer can be ignored and that the price in the American market will be the importer's price plus the import duty, plus transportation and other charges, and plus a very abnormal margin of profit.

Shall we continue to permit the importer to pull the wool over our eyes and deceive us into protecting him in his methods of profiteering? No doubt there has come to the attention of every Member of the House propaganda by importers claiming that a duty based on American valuation of, say, 25 per cent will be equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 150 or 200 per cent based on the foreign value. How can they arrive at such a conclusion? There is but one way. They must show a tremendous discrepancy between the foreign and the American wholesale selling price. They condemn themselves.

Under the operation of an adequate tariff measure the foreigner and importer will have less to say in regard to prices in the American market. He will have less opportunity to exact abnormal profits, for domestic industry will be encouraged and healthy domestic competition will influence prices in the United States. It is fair to the man who has something to sell and fair to the man who has something to buy. It means increased domestic production with labor well employed. It opens the gate to prosperity.

American valuation is the logical solution of the present-day economic conditions. Where a wide margin exists between the domestic and foreign production costs a nominal duty based on American valuation will be equivalent to a much higher rate based on the foreign value; but it is in cases of this kind that the importer is now exacting abnormal profits. It is in cases of this kind that a larger measure of protection is needed. It is in cases of this kind that a duty based on the foreign value is so small that it is of no benefit to the American industry and of little benefit to the United States Treasury.

Where an increased duty is required American valuation tends to supply it, and where an increased duty is not required American valuation does not give it. If the foreign wholesale selling price should be as high as the American selling price, a duty on American valuation would be no higher than the duty on foreign valuation, and as rates based on American valuation in all cases would be lower than if based on the foreign value, it is seen that under the American valuation proposal, where protection is not needed and where the foreign price is high, the actual amount of duty levied will be decreased.

The average American retailer who has no foreign connection or facility for importing is placed at a tremendous disadvantage on account of the unfair competition. His interests are not at all identical with the interests of the department store engaged chiefly in the selling of imported merchandise.

The average retailer should favor American valuation—he should want wholesale prices to be regulated by competition within the United States, so that he would be able to purchase his stock at as low a price as his competitor, the large department store and the large mail-order house. The average retailer should favor American valuation because it is in the interest of the American manufacturer who furnishes employment to American labor, for upon the purchasing power of American labor his market depends.

Reliable information came to me regarding the importation of many thousand dozen pairs of a fine quality of washable gloves at a laid-down cost of less than 20 cents per pair. An effort was made to trace these gloves into the retail trade, but without success. A comparable glove of American make was found retailing at $3 a pair, and a reasonable conclusion is that the supply of domestic gloves will be disposed of before the foreign article is offered. It seems evident that large quantities of these imported gloves are going into storage. Whether the consumer will have any benefit from the low foreign price is problematical. The importer can and will exact an abnormal profit. One thing is certain, the large distributor of gloves, now importing from abroad, will make no purchases of American gloves as long as prices abroad and import duties here remain at their present low level.

A healthy export trade can not be built up if industry in the United States is idle. This has been demonstrated over and over again, and the American consumer is not benefited, because his power to purchase is dependent directly or indirectly upon domestic production.

Exports for the month of November, 1921, are less than for any month during the past seven years. In value there still appears an excess of exports over imports, but it must be remembered that the import values reported are the values in a foreign country. If there were any way of comparing quantities of imports and exports, the displacement of American goods at this time by imported articles would be astounding.

Importers talk of the necessity of furnishing a foreign market for America's surplus. Under the present tariff policy, however, the surplus of goods in the American market is increased rather than diminished as a result of our foreign trade. More American goods would be sold and there would be more employment for American labor if a tariff policy is adopted that will preserve the domestic market for the product of American labor.

It is my very confident prediction that our total foreign commerce will show a marked gain if an adequate tariff policy is adopted. It is also my confident prediction that if the present tariff policy continues our total foreign trade will continue to diminish. It has been proven in the past and it will be proven again that a healthty foreign trade can not be built up on industrial idleness in the United States.

On the other hand, if an adequate tariff law is enacted, it will be proven again, as it has been proven in the past, that industrial activity in the United States will inevitably result in increased foreign commerce.

The argument that we must surrender American markets to benefit other countries is fallacious. Surrendering our markets means the surrendering of wages and employment of American labor. It means the diminishing of the purchasing power of the American people. It means business stagnation in the United States; and I say very firmly that now, as in the past, any policy that occasions business depression in the United States will not place the United States in a position to aid foreign countries.

Other countries of the world recognize as the result of the present abnormal conditions the urgent necessity for increased import duties. The importer, prejudiced as he is, is endeavoring to lead the American people to arrive at a converse conclusion. In the face of increased import duties by the principal nations of the world, they seek to tell us that, due to unsettled conditions abroad, a tariff law at this time can not successfully be written. I wish to assert very vigorously at this time that the unsettled condition of the world to-day is not a reason for delaying tariff action, but is a very urgent reason for hastening the passage of a tariff law that will afford a reasonable degree of protection to American industries.

Monetary conditions abroad are chaotic, and a continuation of the present tariff law will bring the chaos of Europe to America's shores, for we can not meet the importations from central Europe unless our production costs are reduced to approach the European level. Our production costs can not be reduced to the European level unless wages are correspondingly reduced. An effort to bring about so tremendous a readjustment means chaos and industrial disaster such as this country has never witnessed.

Gentlemen of the House, we must not be led astray by the importers' propaganda. It is true that the importer is exerting a tremendous influence on the retailer through misrepresentations and otherwise, and the retailer is exerting a tremendous influence on the press of the country.

There has come to my attention an instance where a large department store, spending tremendous sums for advertising in the daily papers, has brought influence to bear to prevent the press from publishing information favorable to the tariff program we are here endeavoring to formulate.

The needs of the country at this time demand that we discard the practice of assessing ad valorem duties on foreign values. An equitable tariff law can not now be written if we follow the old method. There is a dire lack of information throughout the country in regard to the acuteness of competition from abroad. If the whole truth were known, the mystery in regard to unemployment would vanish. To my mind there is no doubt as to what we should do. We must study the facts and provide a solution.

The tariff bill as passed by the House provided for the assessment of ad valorem duties on American values. That is a reasonable and logical remedy for the present-day abnormal conditions and customs abuses.

On account of changed conditions Switzerland has found it necessary to increase import duties in order to protect her industries. In a speech delivered September 11, 1921, in defense of that country's new tariff, the President of Switzerland said:

> Do not forget that it is a great economic mistake to divide the people into producers and consumers. Everyone is a consumer, but he can only spend the income which he obtains directly or indirectly from the result of production or some secondary activity dependent on it. If you annihilate production, you will strike the income and the consumer who cooperates with it, destroying the sources which give him living, and he will have nothing more to spend. The maintenance of production is of vital interest to everybody, and therefore the measures which favor it ought also to be understood and indorsed by everybody. * * *
> The customs tariff is not a work of arbitrariness which owes its origin to personal ideas and fancies. It is the logical consequence of the present-day economic situation. Other men than those who brought it forth would have reached the same result after weighing all circumstances.

I commend the views expressed so ably by the President of Switzerland to the thoughtful consideration of the Members of the House.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not intend to discuss the question of American valuation at this particular time. However, there are some features that my friend from Michigan discussed that I think ought to be answered now. Of course, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] never at any time during his address told the House or the country the real object of American valuation, and that is one objection that I have to his speech. It seems to me the Members of Congress, and especially those of the prominence of the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means, having these questions in charge, ought to tell the people exactly why a piece of legislation is being placed on the statute books.

Let me tell you why, gentlemen. Of course, if you have an American valuation with very low rates in the bill, then you could still have a very high tariff law in this country. For example, the Underwood tariff law, you say in your campaigns, is a free-trade tariff law, although, of course, nobody takes that statement seriously, but you place it before the American people as a free-trade law.

Now, gentlemen, mark this prediction. I had not thought until recently that the Republicans would be so foolish as to place the American valuation plan in our tariff law, but I have come to the conclusion that you are determined to place that sort of law on our statute books. You can take the Underwood tariff law under the American valuation and it would make the tariff law in this country in many instances a great deal higher than the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, the one that split the Republican Party and defeated you in the Nation. But if you place the American valuation plan in your law, gentlemen, in addition to the rates that you have provided in the Fordney tariff bill, the one that is pending in the Senate to-day, you will make the rates on a great many articles absolutely prohibitive.

Now the American people do not want a prohibitive tariff law. No one in America wants that except those who are especially benefited. A day or two ago, it is true, a gentleman did appear before the Senate Finance Committee and asked for a certain rate on flour, and a Senator asked him if that would not be a prohibitive rate on flour, and he said frankly, "Yes; that is what we want. We want to place such a rate on flour so that every barrel of flour consumed in this country will be an American barrel of flour." Of course, he meant that it should be sold at the price fixed by the manufacturer of flour in this country. I do not believe the Members of this House want that, and I do not believe the people want it, and I do not believe that the Republicans in the Senate want it. What I fear is that if you are going to place the American valuation on the books as well as the rates under the Fordney bill, you will increase prices to consumers of America, and they will have to pay the freight.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Do I understand the gentleman to concede that the only principle involved in the American valuation is the rate?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; I do not concede that, in the first place, and I would like to tell you why. I will tell you why right now. I do not think the principle is sound, for this reason: Take the case of Marshall Field & Co. I do not know a man connected with their business. I have never bought a dollar's worth of goods from them in my life. But I understand that while they are great manufacturers in this country and employ a great many laborers at wages such as other American manufacturers pay, yet they import a large amount of goods not produced into this country. They also import goods this year to sell to their customers next year. Is not that true? I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Yes. Every importing house does that.

Mr. OLDFIELD. They must do it. Now, if they must pay duties this year on goods to be sold next year, and do not know what the rate of duty is going to be next year, it is absolutely impossible for them to do that sort of international business.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does he know it now, under existing law, brother? I do not like to interrupt the gentleman. But if he purchases goods this year to be imported next year, if the price goes down his duty is less, but if the price goes up it is more under existing law, except as they may indulge in undervaluations. There would be no change there at all.

Mr. OLDFIELD. There are cases where the manufacturers of certain articles in this country will get together and fix the price of the article on which a duty is to be paid. This sort of thing would put the fixing of the rate of duty in the hands of the manufacturers of this country, who at least are as selfish as any other citizens of the country.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Accepting the statement that the gentleman made, that that is barely possible for American manufacturers to do it, it is equally possible for importers to do it, is it not?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes. That is possible. I hold no brief for the importers. But I say that the 107,000,000 people of America ought to have something to say about tariff rates, because they pay the bill in the end. There is no question about that.

This seems to be a fight between big importers, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] proved beyond question, if he proved anything, that the big importers were profiteers. So far as the domestic manufacturers are concerned, no proof is necessary. Everybody knows it. They admitted it before the Committee on Ways and Means, many of them, that they charged during the war and at all times "all that the traffic would bear."

Therefore, gentlemen, you are trying to saddle a burden on the backs of the American people, you are trying to place the American people in the hands of selfish interests, to be robbed and profiteered on by them.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman is in error. I am not criticizing him. He is expressing his candid opinion. Suppose under the American valuation you and I are producing an article that is costing us a dollar, and the duty would be 40 per cent on that article. The duty would be 40 cents on that one article. Suppose we got together and raised the price to $2. The duty would still be 40 per cent, but the foreign article could not have changed in value. We have changed the market profit for the other fellow from 60 cents to $1.20. It would absolutely work right the other way. It would be impossible for the American manufacturers to get together and raise prices and be benefited thereby. It would be to their direct disadvantage, brother.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would not this be true, that if the American manufacturers did get together and raise the price, then that would be the American valuation?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is just what I said, brother. I said it would be $2 instead of $1, and I gave the illustration that it would work directly against the home manufacturer. He would be working directly against his own interest.

Mr. MANN. He would be raising the amount of duty to be paid by the importer.

Mr. OLDFIELD. And also the price to the domestic consumer.

Mr. MANN. He would be raising the price to his competitor.

Mr. FORDNEY. He would widen the margin between his profit and the foreigner's.

Mr. OLDFIELD. And all the time be getting a greater profit for himself.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; just the reverse.

Mr. MANN. That is the trouble about the American valuation. I have never been able to understand it, and I never heard anybody on the floor who did understand it, including the gentleman from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, there is no man so blind as the man who will not see.

Mr. MANN. That is the case with the gentleman from Michigan. I would like to see. I do not think he does. I would like to understand this from the start.

Mr. FORDNEY. I could expect no other statement from a gentleman coming from Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I do not know that it is any special reflection on anyone to come from Chicago. It was a Chicagoan who saved the life of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Chicago to this, that the gentleman from Michigan did admit that you had churches in Chicago in Sam Jones's day.

Mr. MANN. No; I think he spoke of a bishop who mentioned a church. He had never been in one himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. He told about one that Sam Jones had been in.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Illinois is as enlightened upon the subject of my going to church as he is upon the subject of the American valuation. He knows nothing about it.

Mr. MANN. I admit it.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman from Illinois misunderstood the intention of the gentleman from Michigan when he repeated the old proverb that none are so blind as those who will not see. That was intended as an admission on his part, not a criticism of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FORDNEY. You could not expect anything else from a free trader.

Mr. MANN. I knew that was the fact, but I did not think he admitted it.

Mr. TINCHER. On the subject of the American valuation, to take a specific instance, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY] stated that a knife manufactured in Germany and sold there for 9.6 cents, was imported to this country and sold by Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, at retail for $5. I wondered on what valuation Marshall Field & Co. ought to pay an import duty on that knife, and I wanted to ask if it is not true that we could probably put a duty of $1 on that knife and protect the American manufacturer in manufacturing a knife of that kind and force the knife onto the market to the American consumer for something like $2 and still get a duty of $1 on every German knife that came into this country. [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Of course the man who would pay the increase duty would be the American consumer.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Kansas be in favor of imposing a duty of 1,000 per cent?

Mr. TINCHER. I am just wondering if we could not reduce the price to the American consumer in that way.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has suggested it. I am asking him the question, Is he in favor of a duty of 1,000 per cent?

Mr. TINCHER. If it is necessary to protect American labor and the American manufacturer and the American producer and consumer from the profiteers of this country, such as have been disclosed by the speech of the gentleman from Michigan, I will say it is not a question of per cent. In the knife illustration it would seem that based on the price the consumer pays for the German knife, 1,000 per cent would not affect the selling.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman makes the statement that he is in favor of a duty of 1,000 per cent on knives, does he?

Mr. TINCHER. I am frank to say to you that I, as well as every other Member of this House, am amazed at the statement made here and at the facts presented here concerning this knife, and I am wondering if Marshall Field & Co. are justified in their propaganda to keep the duty as it is at present on a knife that costs 9.6 cents. Of course the duty even at 1,000 per cent on a knife which costs that much in Germany would not be very much.

Mr. MANN. Let there be a few more statements on this side of the House that the Republicans are in favor of a tariff duty of 1,000 per cent, and there will not be enough Republicans here to gather together in one aisle. [Laughter.] I have been here long enough to know that.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the Republicans favor destroying American institutions, they ought to be put out of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand it, under the Underwood law there is a tariff duty on this knife of 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think it is 40 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Fifty-five per cent on knives valued at more than $1 per dozen.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand, it would be something like a duty of 6 cents on that knife, which they buy in Germany for a little over 9 cents, pay the 6 cents duty, and then sell the knife in this country for $5. Now, I am new on the tariff and am not afraid to take hold of it, as some people seem to be. The question in my mind is whether we had better protect the American consumer by protecting the American manufacturer, and permitting him to manufacture the knife, and actually reduce the price of the knife, as we undoubtedly would by permitting it to be manufactured in this country, or whether we ought to go ahead and permit the importation of that knife under a duty of 6 cents, which is so small that it does not allow the American manufacturer to make that knife in this country. Of course, we are only using the knife as an illustration.

Mr. OLDFIELD. In just a few minutes more I will conclude.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman in those few minutes explain to us what kind of a knife it is that the farmers of Michigan and Kansas pay $5 apiece for? Down in our country we do not buy that kind of a knife.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is a farmer and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] is a farmer, and both of them have these knives, as I understand. A United States Senator from my State was in Europe in August, and the other night he showed me a knife that cost him, I think, 200 marks. That was in August that he bought it. I do not know how much the mark was worth then, probably three-quarters of a cent or a cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Forty-six one-hundredths of a cent in August.

Mr. OLDFIELD. But here is the trouble about this: My friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] are protectionists to the limit. The gentleman from Michigan would not permit anything that can be produced in this country to be shipped into this country from abroad. That is the position he takes; I do not think that all the Republicans take that position; I am sure that the majority of the American people do not, and I am sure the gentleman from Kansas would go almost as far, but the trouble is you do not tell the facts to the people of America why you want the American valuation. Why do not you talk turkey and say that you wanted to boost tariff rates?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the gentleman does me an injustice; he never heard me make that statement.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Well, I will take it back. I was under that impression.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Let me say that all my life I have been what is known as a protectionist. I am in favor of protection to American labor and American institutions. I never favored a tariff that would give a special privilege to American manufacturers. I have always favored a tariff that will put our industries on a competitive basis with foreign manufacturers. The gentleman has made a statement that the American valuation will put goods manufactured in foreign countries on a prohibitive basis. For myself I am not in favor nor will I help to pass any such law, and I would like to have the gentleman give the House the benefit of his examination and his experience, showing us what kind of manufactures or articles would be made prohibitive by the American valuation and under the rates as given by what is known as the Fordney Tariff Act?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I can give the gentleman only one example, because I do not want to give hearsay, but one appeared before the committee. I think it was an affidavit of some manufacturer or importer. The fact is the importers are rather frightened when they come before the Committee on Ways and Means, for the chairman goes at them red-eyed and abuses them as though they were not human beings. But one man said that if you put the American valuation on a certain chair—I think it was a reed or a bamboo chair—it would increase the duty to 1,590 per cent, and such a duty would put him out of business so far as these chairs were concerned. That is one instance.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me give you the facts. The evidence before the committee was that the chair presented there, imported from China, the landing value of which was $2 in San Francisco, would cost to make in a factory in the State of Michigan $5. Therefore, the foreign valuation would have to be 150 per cent to bring up the difference between the foreign and the landing valuation and the cost of production in this country.

Mr. OLDFIELD. There is no doubt on the face of the earth that on hundreds of articles imported into this country the duty on the American valuation would be prohibitive. But it is not the imports that is hurting the country to-day. Take the commerce reports, take Mr. Hoover's reports, and you will see that from last October a year ago every month the imports have fallen off, and also our exports have fallen off. The imports have fallen off every month for more than a year.

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe that the Republicans want a prohibitory tariff. The trouble is, if you vote for the American valuation plan, you do not know whether you are going to get it or not. I do not think there is the slightest doubt about it. There will be hundreds of articles that can not be imported into this country under this sort of a law. That is the meanest part of this agitation. I am glad to see the Marshall Field Co. go after this American valuation proposition and controlling part of the press. I think a good many will be with us in the next campaign and that they will not support your party. We would like to have the Marshall Field Co. with us.

Mr. FORDNEY. Take them and all that goes with them.

Mr. OLDFIELD. All right; I trust my friend from Illinois will tell Marshall Field Co. what the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee says.

Mr. MANN. The influence of the chairman in Chicago is nil. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am sorry. Now, as I said a while ago, it is not the imports that is the trouble in this country. Of course, we can not export unless we import. We can not sell our surplus products throughout the world as we used to. The people have not got the money with which to buy. The purpose of all protective tariffs is to enable the manufacturers and producers to make a profit, and, of course, the people who buy the goods must pay the tariff tax. You are going to boost the price of products if the protective tariff means anything and turn over the American market in many cases to a few corporations, and they will charge monopoly prices at all times. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that when the time comes the House will vote against the American valuation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss briefly the unemployment situation which has been brought to my attention at this time by reason of the amendment which was placed on the Russian relief bill yesterday in the Senate, adding $100,000 appropriation to the bill, such sum to be expended through the Department of Labor in endeavoring to find employment for the unemployed in the United States.

It must be admitted, regretfully admitted, that there is widespread unemployment throughout the country, and it may be wise and proper to carry an appropriation of $100,000 to be expended by the Department of Labor as the amendment contemplates. I shall not oppose it, but I think it is well that Congress and the country understand that we will never correct the unemployment situation by temporary expedients of this sort. There are some fundamental causes which must be corrected before the situation is ever remedied. Certainly one of the most substantial of these causes is the unbalanced condition that exists between the prices of farm products, the wages of labor in certain groups of organized employees, and the wholesale and retail prices which prevail on certain manufactured goods. It might have been better for all concerned if the high prices of May, 1920, could have been maintained all around. I will not stop to discuss that feature of the matter now. The fact remains that 1920 prices have not been maintained and probably could not have been maintained. Since May, 1920, farm products have declined on an average, as I recall it, of about 52 per cent, and other things in general, not at all in proportion.

Certain groups of highly organized labor, such as those employed by the railroads, the coal mines, and in the buildings trades, have resisted efforts to lower wages to any appreciable degree, upon the contention that labor is not a commodity, and therefore should not respond in any sense to conditions which affect commodity prices. It is one of the favorite expressions of some gentlemen who assume to speak for labor that "labor is not a commodity." I have no quarrel to make with that statement, but there are certain understandings which it is necessary for us to have when we make that statement, and these understandings are not usually accepted nor given any consideration by the announced spokesmen of organized labor. One of these necessary understandings is that most of the wages of labor and most of the profits of industry are inextricably interwoven with the prices of commodities. The relative prices of the two can not remain separated very long without serious disturbance to the national prosperity. Some strongly intrenched industries, some highly organized labor, may for a time resist successfully the economic pressure, but in the end the relation between commodity prices and the wages of labor and the profits of industry must be brought into some sort of an equitable arrangement.

Labor not a commodity? Of course not, but it should be remembered the wheat farmer has the price of his labor determined by the price which he receives for his commodity, and, therefore, he is vitally concerned whether wheat sells for $2 a bushel or for 95 cents a bushel. Likewise the corn farmer has the price of his labor determined by the price which he receives for his commodity. Therefore he is vitally concerned whether his corn is selling for $1.75 a bushel, as it was 18 months ago, or for 45 cents a bushel and less, as it is at the present time. So is the cotton farmer and the hog grower and the cattle raiser vitally concerned as to the price which he receives for his commodities, for not only are the earnings on his capital but the wages of his labor dependent upon these prices. When the wheat farmer was receiving $2 a bushel for his wheat he could exchange it for twice as much transportation as he can buy now with a bushel of wheat. Why? Because wheat has declined to 95 cents a bushel and transportation has declined but little.

When corn was selling for $1.75 a bushel, as it was 18 months ago, the corn farmer could exchange the product of his labor for three times as much transportation as he can buy with a bushel of corn to-day. Why? Because the price of transportation remains at a high level, whereas his corn has declined to the figure that I have named. The same illustration might be given as to the cotton farmer, the hog raiser, and the cattle raiser, and all of the rest of that large part of our population who produce commodities and have seen them decline to these low-price levels. I use transportation as an illustration for convenience and not because it is the only thing which has not declined in proportion to commodity prices, because many of those manufactured articles about which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was so solicitous this afternoon in his tariff debate, are still on very high-price levels. He seems to think that these high production costs can still be maintained by the aid of his so-called "American valuation plan." In such calculations he is due for a real disillusionment. What is the result of this unbalanced condition of prices between agriculture and other industries? The net result is this: The purchasing power of nearly half the population of the country has been reduced from one-third to one-half of what it was at the peak of high prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Therefore the demand for transportation and the many other things which have not declined in proportion has been reduced in proportion to the reduction in purchasing power of this large section of our population, and it is this slackened demand which is throwing thousands of men out of employment, and I stop long enough to say that Congress can adopt all of the artificial expedients that a fertile brain can imagine for the relief of this unemployment, but it will not be relieved until the exchange values of products of the farm and labor and services and manufactured commodities are brought into something like a just and equitable basis with each other.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. KING. I know that the gentleman from Texas is a friend of the farmer, and a friend of the people in general. I agree in all that the gentleman has stated.

But I want to ask him this question: The farmers' prices he was receiving have been reduced. The gentleman has not explained fully, I believe, the reason why these prices have been reduced. Were his credits not deflated and was it not done by the connivance of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the banks of the country by calling the farmers' loans at a time they were attempting to hold their corn and wheat, and did not this action make them throw their products upon the market, and the deplorable condition of the farmer resulting therefrom is the reason why we are all suffering? I ask the gentleman from Texas if it is not a fact that if we could change the authority of the Federal Reserve Board in such a way that the board could not control the commodity prices of this country by the allocation of credits, that such change would tend to remedy the situation?

Mr. BLACK. Well, in brief reply, because I must be brief, let me say: I would not undertake at this time to discuss the Federal reserve act or the authority of the Federal Reserve Board, except to say that it is not my understanding that the board has any authority now, or ever has had, to control commodity prices, nor has it attempted to exercise any such authority, so far as I know. I think a great mistake has been made on the part of many people in assuming that the decline in commodity prices has been due primarily to some arbitrary action of the Federal Reserve Board. Now, it may be true that by a wiser administration of the Federal reserve act that the rigors of the situation through which we are passing might have been ameliorated. The Federal Reserve Board is not perfect, and I have no doubt it has made some errors, but I am quite clear in my own mind that the only way by which the high prices and inflated profits and abnormal wages of the war period could have been temporarily maintained would have been to flood the country with issues of paper money, such as certain European countries have done, but if that policy were pursued long enough we would soon get to where, like Russia, it would take a handful of paper money to buy a loaf of bread or a pound of meat. And that would not be the worst of it; production would decrease to such an extent that there would not be many loaves of bread or pounds of meat to be had at any price. Yes; start the paper mills to grinding until, like in Germany and Austria and Russia, down goes the unit of monetary value to where it becomes a thing of contempt and nobody will have it. No. The American workman when he works is entitled to receive in payment dollars which are worth 100 cents, and on his part rests the obligation to give an honest day's work in return for a fair day's pay. And if the dollars which he receives in pay continue to be worth 100 cents, they must at all times be redeemable in gold, and, though these dollars may change somewhat in purchasing power with the rise and fall in prices, they will always be worth 100 cents in the standard coin of the realm.

Fiat money is a dangerous expedient for any country to embrace.

In Germany on November 23 last there were outstanding something over 96,000,000,000 marks in paper money, against which there was held a gold reserve of only 993,000,000 marks, or less than 1 per cent.

Of course, with a ratio of that kind there can be no such thing as gold redemption either now or hereafter, and therefore the issuance of new paper money goes merrily on, meanwhile Germany approaches nearer and nearer to the verge of bankruptcy. Perhaps the plight of her finances was unavoidable in view of the heavy reparations which she has to pay to the Allies. But her example, at least, should serve to forcibly remind us of the dangers of an overinflation of the currency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the gentleman. My father was a soldier in the Confederate Army, and he used to show me when I was a boy some Confederate currency that he had kept as relics of the days which were gone; and he told me how in the latter days of the Confederacy, when so much of the currency had been issued and with no gold to redeem it with and with the failing prospects of the Confederacy, it got down to where it was not worth anything scarcely, and he was fond of telling me a story of a soldier who was granted a furlough to go home. He was riding his only horse, when he came across a stranger, who accosted him to buy his horse and pay him in Confederate money. The soldier said to him, "How much will you give me for him?" "Well," the stranger said, "I will give you $75,000." [Laughter.] The soldier replied, "I can not do that, I gave $100,000 to have him shod a short time ago." [Laughter.] Well, I have no doubt in Russia to-day it costs 100,000 rubles to have a blacksmith shoe a horse, and then the blacksmith would not get the cost of his services.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think the Federal Reserve Board banking system would have saved the Confederacy?

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the gentleman is not serious in asking the latter question. Now, let me say this one thing further to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING]. At the time that the Federal Reserve Board in 1920 advanced the discount rate to check inflation we were right at the margin of the required gold reserve of 40 per cent, right at it. That reserve requirement had been fixed by congressional enactment, and the Federal Reserve Board had no right to disobey the law of Congress and disregard the situation that faced it at the time. Of course, if Congress had wanted to change the reserve requirement it could have done so. It did not do so. Therefore it was the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to carry out the law as written. The gold reserve in the Federal reserve banks is now ample to support all reasonable credit requirements of the country. Therefore I hope the Federal Reserve Board will pursue a policy of liberality during the present period of contraction.

Mr. Chairman, there has never been a time in American history when the spirit of cooperation between industry and labor and agriculture were more important than they are now. All of these elements of our national life need to bear in mind that the very test of the civilization of any people is their ability to cooperate.

The mine worker, for instance, who thinks that he owes none of his success and prosperity as a worker to cooperation with capital does not stop to think that the ore which he brings to the mouth of the mine would have no value but for the ability to transport it to the great furnaces erected by the combined forces of capital and labor and there melt it into pig iron, and this pig iron would have no value but for the ability to transport it to the great steel mills and there press it into plates and mold it into bars of steel, and these plates and bars of steel would be utterly worthless but for the ability to transport them to the factories and there manufacture them into axes and saws and hammers and rakes and plows and thrashing machines and a thousand and one other implements of husbandry and toil, and all of these implements of husbandry and toil would be of no value except for the ability to sell them to the farmer and the mechanic and the business man and the laborer to be used by them in the production of the real worth of the country, and all of the surplus production of these workers would amount only to a rotting heap except for the ability of one worker to exchange the surplus of his production for the surplus production of another, and it is because this very system of exchange has largely broken down that there is such widespread unemployment throughout the United States and the world.

And yet some shortsighted spokesman of labor says that labor is not effected by the law of supply and demand and can fix an arbitrary standard of wages and maintain it regardless of what ratio it may bear to commodity prices and business conditions in general. No more false and hurtful economic theory was ever held by anyone than this, and nothing is damaging labor so much and bringing to it such widespread and disastrous unemployment as the present unbalanced condition between farm prices and prices in the industries. The situation is very much the same as when one day Uncle Cy started to town and promised his wife that he would buy her a present. After he got there he imbibed rather freely, and when he went to select the present he concluded that he would buy her a bolt of cheesecloth, and after making his purchase and getting back home he turned the package over to his wife. With high hopes and fond expectations she unrolled the bundle and found the bolt of cheesecloth. Holding it up to the sunlight and seeing how easy it was to see through, she remarked to Cy in disgust, "Look how thin it is." "Yes," replied Cy, "That is true, but my God, look at the length of it."

That is the way with some labor leaders. They say to their men, "We are bound to admit that your work is spread out mighty thin, but look at the length of the wages you get when you do work." What good, may I inquire, does it do a laboring man to point to the length of his salary and the high sounding wage which he theoretically gets when it is spread out so thin that he don't average but one or two days a week at work? It is a false economic theory, gentlemen, and can only be maintained at great cost and suffering to labor itself. The longer an attempt is made to sustain this false doctrine, the longer it will be before we reach a full period of employment and full resumption of our industries.

What I have said with reference to labor applies with equal force to efforts of many capitalists to keep up their profit earning on the inflated war basis. There is less excuse for this effort on their part than there is for labor to keep up its high wages.

It can not be done. The business man and the manufacturer and the labor organization which face conditions as they are and make the necessary readjustments will find in the long run that they have acted the part of wisdom and have done much to lift industry out of the slough of despond and to give full employment to labor.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in conclusion about a subject which is entirely foreign to the one which I have just been discussing. It is about the collateral requirements of the War Finance Corporation for loans made by the corporation. Gentlemen will remember that some three or four months ago Congress passed a law extending and enlarging the activities of the War Finance Corporation. I have gathered from statements of bankers made in certain parts of Texas that some of them are under the impression that loans are only made upon live-stock and warehouse commodity collateral. Recently I took the matter up with the corporation, and one of the directors, Mr. McLean, has furnished me with a statement in a letter which he wrote me which I think possibly might afford some information to the House. He states:

> The understanding of the bank cashier whose letter you quote, to the effect that the corporation may make agricultural and live-stock loans only upon the pledge of cotton or live-stock security, is incorrect.
> These agricultural and live-stock loans, as you doubtless know, can not be made directly to farmers or cattlemen, but loans made by banks or live-stock loan companies for agricultural or live-stock purposes may be made the basis of an application by such banks or live-stock companies to the corporation for advances up to the amount of the agricultural or live-stock loans made by them to their customers.
> As collateral security for such advances the board will accept not only live-stock chattel mortgage security and warehouse receipts for cotton and other staple agricultural products, but also any good currently quoted bonds, farmers' notes, or other receivables or liquid assets of the applying bank. A number of advances have been approved by the board, the principal collateral security for which consisted of farmers' notes of the character described in your correspondent's letter.
> Of course, you understand that the law requires that the corporation take full and adequate security for every advance made and that the margin of collateral which the applying bank would be asked in any given case to furnish would, therefore, depend upon the resources and financial standing of the applying bank, whose direct obligation for the amount of the advance applied for would constitute the primary security.

I will only say further with reference to this that it is my information that the corporation has already loaned since Congress passed the law which I have just mentioned something more than $100,000,000 for agricultural and live-stock purposes, which, in my judgment, has been of great and substantial benefit to the agricultural and live-stock interests.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did I understand that the resources of the bank are taken as the basis of the loan from the gentleman's letter?

Mr. BLACK. That is one of the determining factors.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would seem to me that the individual ability to pay would be the basis of the loan.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, sundry messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On December 15, 1921:

H. R. 3116. An act validating homestead entry of Mike Campbell for certain public land in Alaska;

H. R. 5511. An act for the relief of John Cestnik, jr.;

H. R. 6961. An act granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane;

H. R. 7161. An act to authorize certain desert-land claimants who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries;

H. R. 7780. An act for the relief of G. Fred Roach and others; and

H. R. 9237. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

On December 16, 1921:

H. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to the dead of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, in the World War.

On December 19, 1921:

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

On December 20, 1921:

H. R. 2205. An act to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone River to the Shoshone National Forest;

H. R. 6864. An act authorizing exchanges of lands within the Rainier National Forest, in the State of Washington; and

H. R. 3250. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Wyoming I yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to discuss the work of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry and the methods which it has pursued and the conclusions it has reached, so far as it has reached conclusions as the result of the investigations so far made. The joint resolution creating the commission was passed on June 7, 1921, and it required the commission to investigate and report upon the following subjects:

(1) The causes of the present condition of agriculture.

(2) The cause of the difference between the price of agricultural products paid to the producer and the ultimate cost to the consumer.

(3) The comparative condition of industries other than agriculture.

(4) The relation of prices of commodities other than agricultural products to such products.
(5) The banking and financial resources, especially as affecting agricultural products.
(6) The marketing and transportation facilities of the country.

Gentlemen will observe this resolution was very broad. It imposed upon the commission a task which seemed to me impossible. In order to bring it into some relation with what it seemed to me might be possible to do we divided the commission's investigation into four general subdivisions. First, the agricultural crisis and its causes; second, credit, particularly agricultural credit; third, transportation; and fourth, marketing and distribution. The commission on Thursday last made a report covering the first of these subdivisions—the agricultural crisis and its causes. The second subdivision is now in galley proof, and we expect will be ready for issue immediately following the recess, while the reports upon transportation and upon marketing are now in the process of writing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the first report available?

Mr. ANDERSON. The first report is printed. No resolution, however, has been adopted for its printing in such numbers as will permit the Members to supply their constituents. I have introduced such a resolution, and I am in hopes that the Committee on Printing will report it at an early date.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, in determining the causes for the present condition of agriculture, it is obviously necessary to determine what that condition actually was. The condition of an industry is not static and, consequently, the condition at any given time must be determined with reference to the condition at some other time. In general the commission assumed 1913 as representing a normal year and as representing the normal price relation between the prices of agricultural products and the prices of other commodities. In determining the condition of agriculture upon this comparative basis, we sought to apply four tests. The first of these tests was the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar; the second, the relation of the absolute prices of agricultural products to the prices of other groups of commodities; third, the quantity production in agriculture as compared with the quantity production in other industries; and fourth, wages and incomes in agriculture as compared with the wages and incomes in other industries. In other words, and perhaps more accurately, the reward for capital invested and to labor employed in agriculture as compared with the rewards for capital invested and labor employed in other industries. Very briefly, in May of this year, as compared with 1913, the farmer's dollar was worth 63 cents. In other words, it would purchase 63 per cent as much of other commodities in May, 1921, as it would have purchased in 1913. That represents a reduction in the purchasing power of the farmers of the country of something more than 37 per cent. This represents a lower purchasing power than has existed at any time in the last 30 years. So it is fair to say that in purchasing power, or as indicated by the purchasing power, the farmer was worse off in 1921 than he was in 1920, or than he has been any time in the last 30 years. Now, the relative position of an industry as indicated by prices may be affected by the fact that the price of one group of commodities rises or falls more quickly or at a more rapid rate than the prices of another group of commodities.

The prices of agricultural commodities began to decline in the fall of 1919, and they were the first to feel the effect of the coming depression, and because they fell earlier and more rapidly than the prices of other commodities the farmer's situation in 1920 and 1921 was relatively worse than it would have been had these commodities all fallen at the same rate and to the same degree.

Now, I come to the farmer's condition as determined by quantity production. It seems sound to assume that the progress of an industry may be measured, in part at least, by the quantity production of that industry as compared with the quantity production of other industries and as compared with the growth of population. We sought to set up an index which would indicate the increase in quantity production of agriculture as compared with the increase in quantity production, for instance, from mines and from manufacturing establishments. These indexes show that, on the whole, quantity production of agricultural products has just about kept pace with population. In grains it has slightly exceeded the growth in population, while in live stock as a whole, with the exception of pork, it has not quite kept pace with population. Comparing quantity production in agriculture with quantity production in other industries we find the quantity production in agriculture has lagged far behind the quantity production both of manufactures and of mines. This seems to me to indicate that the prices received by the farmers during the last 30 years for agricultural products have not been such as to induce an increase in quantity production in agriculture comparable with the increases in quantity production in other industries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has, of course, in his study and observation of this subject, observed the amount and quantity of our chief agricultural products that have been raised in the last few years, and it seems to me it might not be out of place at this point to call attention to a matter with which the gentleman, of course, is quite familiar, but with which all of his hearers may not be, that we have had three great crops of corn in succession, the last two being each over 3,000,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Considerably over.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Considerably over, as the gentleman from Michigan suggests. The average of all three of them is over 3,000,000,000 bushels, something that in the history of the country has never occurred before, and which I think has had considerable to do with the depression in the price of corn. What is the gentleman's opinion in regard to that?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman is entirely correct about that, particularly, of course, as exports of corn do not represent anything like the same proportion of the total crop as is the case in wheat. As a matter of fact, probably the greatest influence in the present situation as regards prices of agricultural products is the lack of domestic consumption.

For instance, in 1920 the apparent domestic consumption of wheat declined, as compared with 1919, from 6.9 bushels to 4.6 bushels per capita, or approximately 230,000,000 bushels less were consumed in America, apparently, in 1920, than in 1919. Had it not been for the very large export that took place in 1920 the price of wheat would have been very much lower than it was.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman give any reason for that decline in consumption?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it was due to the general conditions of unemployment and industrial depression. If you go back for a period of 30 years you will find that the consumption of wheat and beef are peculiarly susceptible to periods of industrial depression, and that a decline in consumption of beef and wheat has occurred in practically every period of industrial depression in the country's history.

That is a peculiar fact, but it is a fact which I think accounts in large measure, or in some measure at least, for the greater impulse against prices which occur in the case of agricultural products.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is not strange. Is it not because of the economies practiced by the people as the result of depressed conditions?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the variation in the consumption of wheat, for instance, in periods of prosperity and in periods of depression is so large as to be rather surprising.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question with reference to the statement he made a moment ago?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understood the gentleman to say—I may have misunderstood—that the per capita production of the staple crops has not declined.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is a general statement which is subject, of course, to certain individual exceptions.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Take wheat and corn, for instance.

Mr. ANDERSON. Wheat and corn have just about kept pace as a whole. Cotton has declined. Beef has declined. Pork has a little more than kept pace with population.

I come now to the discussion of the rewards for capital invested and labor employed in agriculture as compared with the rewards for capital invested and labor employed in other industries.

Mr. KING. Before the gentleman goes into that, will he answer a short question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Which began first, the industrial depression or the deflation of the farmer's prices, if he has any information on that?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman will find in the report to which I have referred a table which shows just which groups of commodities declined first. The decline occurred first in July, 1919, in hogs. Live stock declined in the same month; bacon in the same month; and mutton in the same month. The cattle prices began to decline in October; butter in November, 1919; cloths and clothing did not begin to decline until March; and you get finally over to February and April, 1921, when there were slight declines in crude petroleum, coal, and commodities of that sort.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether it was before the industrial depression began; whether the farmer's prices were not deflated before the workingmen began to get out of work and farmers found themselves in the position where they have not been able to purchase as they did before.

Mr. ANDERSON. The declines occurred first in agricultural products, and with that decline in prices the farmer's purchasing power declined and his ability to buy the products of manufacturers. As that decline continued and the purchasing power continued to be reduced more and more unemployment occurred in the industrial centers of the country; and, of course, as industrial unemployment continued, that had a reflex in the consumption of agricultural products.

It is an interrelated situation. After all, gentlemen, you can not have a condition of depression in any considerable part of the population without affecting the prosperity of all the rest of the country. That, I think, is abundantly clear.

To proceed now with wages and incomes in agriculture as compared with wages and incomes in other industries, the commission used in determining the facts on this matter a study made by the National Bureau of Economic Research, of New York.

This study shows that the average income of the farmers of the United States for labor, risk, and management, after allowing 5 per cent on the investment, in years prior to 1919, and 5½ per cent in 1919 and 6½ in 1920, was as follows:

In other words, in actual money in 1920 the return to the farmer for labor, risk, and management was substantially back to the figure for 1913, but in purchasing power the situation was very different. Measured in terms of purchasing power, the reward of the farmer for risk, labor, and management, after allowing the return for capital to which I referred, was, in 1913, $444; in 1919, $833; and in 1920, $219.

In other words, measured in purchasing power the return to the farmer in 1920 was about one-half what it was in 1913. I do not have the 1921 figures, but I think it is safe to say that they would be considerably below the figures of 1920 in purchasing power.

Now we have some comparisons of the rewards for labor, risk, and management on the farm and the rewards in the way of wages in mines, factories, railways, and banks. These figures come down only to 1918.

In 1913 the average reward of the farmer was $444; of the employee in the mining industry, $755; in factories, $705; on railways, $782; and in banks, $930.

In 1918 the reward of the farmer was $1,278; mining employee, $1,280; factory employee, $1,147; railway employee, $1,394; and in banks, $1,461. So it is evident that in actual money return the farmers' condition greatly improved as compared with those engaged in other industries from 1913 to 1918. That improvement, however, has been more than offset by the depression which has occurred since 1919.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. In arriving at the figures which the gentleman has given, was the fact taken into consideration that the farmer raises a great deal that he consumes?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is fully taken into consideration in these figures, as is also the fact that a good deal of the crop is raised on the farm in duplication; in other words, that corn serves as food for hogs, and that a certain amount of the produce raised on the farm is used in producing milk, and so forth; and allowance was made for the fact that the farmer gets a certain amount of his living off the farm.

Mr. MAPES. In making these comparative figures allowance was made for the fact that the farmer raises his own potatoes and a great deal of what he eats?

Mr. ANDERSON. Those things were all considered in arriving at this determination.

Mr. MAPES. He is charged with them as a part of his income?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. Then certain allowances are made for the payment of interest and things of that sort.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do these figures apply to the male farmer, the head of the family, or do they take into consideration the members of his family?

Mr. ANDERSON. This is the average reward for the farmer. That would be, practically speaking, the average reward per farm.

In terms of purchasing power the farmer received in 1913, $444; the mining employee, $775; the factory employee, $705; the railway employee, $782; the bank employee, $930.

In 1918, measured in purchasing power, the farmer received $826; the mining employee, $808; the factory employee, $725; the railway employee, $882; and the bank employee, $925.

Mr. Chairman, the commission endeavored as far as possible, in arriving at its conclusions, to bring together all of the factors which have a definite influence in an economic sense upon farm prices, assuming that prices in one aspect or the other were the real measure of the farmer's prosperity.

With the exhaustion of the credit which European Governments had in the United States following the close of the war, which at the close of the war amounted to about $2,500,000,000, there occurred a very marked decline in the export of farm products. This decline began first in meat products, including both beef and pork. The declines were very marked, indeed. I will not take the time to cite the figures. Coincidentally with the decline in exports there occurred a decline in prices, which followed very closely in degree the decline in exports.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. My question is whether the comparison was with the prices before the war or during the war, when, of course, we were making large exports?

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the prices of only a few of the agricultural products are below the level of 1913, and the decline, of course, occurred from the peak prices, most of which were reached along in March, April, and May, 1920, but in agricultural products as far back as June, 1919.

There is in this connection one thing which I think ought to be mentioned, and that is that in the case of other than agricultural products the decline in price was immediately followed or immediately preceded by a decline in production. In other words, the manufacturing industries of the country, so far as they could, reduced their losses by reducing production to correspond with the lessened demands.

Whereas in the case of the farmer, he was not able to reduce his production in accordance with the lessened demand; consequently there were poured on the market in the midst of declining prices quantities of agricultural products for which there was no market or a market so low that the prices received were wholly insufficient to liquidate the cost of making the crop.

Now, I was referring to the fact that we tried to marshal the factors that had to do with making prices. Those are, as we saw it, production, including imports, and demand, including exports. That, of course, excludes the factors which have an influence in this domain more or less psychological in character. As I have indicated, in practically all the foreign products with the exception of wheat and rye there began in 1919 a marked falling off of exports, and, in my judgment, this was the first cause of the falling of agricultural prices. There occurred shortly after and beginning in 1920 a very marked falling off in the consumption of agricultural products. This falling off of consumption with the falling off of exports were, in my judgment, the largest factors in bringing about the marked decline in the prices of agricultural products which the farmer experienced in the latter part of 1920 and the early part of 1921.

I should say the crises such as that through which we have been passing during the past three years are not new. Cycles of this kind have occurred to all civilized countries of the world at more or less regular intervals as long as we have any history of economic movements. These cycles begin usually at periods such as we are approaching now when wages are down, when interest rates are low, when shelf stocks of merchants have been largely worked off, and even the small demand that exists in periods of depression is equal to the supply. With this situation business begins to revive, more and more people become employed, more and more goods are consumed, business expands at a constantly increasing rate, and unemployment disappears and wages increase. As prices rise—and I am describing what I think occurred in 1919—there developed a profitable market for goods. This is usually indicated first on the stock exchange, and it usually follows from the stock exchange into commodities, and finally into real estate and property of that character. Paper profits during the period of expansion are large.

Orders pile up in great number and duplication. Industrial plants are extended to meet this large demand. People buy first moderately, then extravagantly, and finally beyond their current income. All the economic factors apparently in periods of great business activity and prosperity combine to produce an era of high prices, expansion, and speculation. In these periods of great expansion and prosperity large volumes of debts are made. The debts are made for production, consumption, and for expansion of plants, and at last they begin to accumulate faster than savings from current production can pay them.

But when this exhaustion of credit appears it results in a reversal of the psychologic and economic features which combined to produce the period of expansion. Bankers who have exhausted their own credit and resources through their correspondents and with the Federal reserve banks find it necessary to stop loaning and then to call loans. This has the effect of forcing goods on the market, and as the goods are forced on the market prices decline. As prices decline, more goods come on the market and the buyers' strike develops. People who previously bought for a profit now sell as fast as they can to avoid loss. This situation continues with consequent stopping of production and unemployment until at last shelf stocks are again worked off, interest rates come down, wages are low, and we are ready again for another period of prosperity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have heard it expressed very emphatically that the price of the farmers' commodities was materially affected by transportation, and that in one part of the country they are burning corn, which sells for 15 cents a bushel, and in another part of the country it is $1 a bushel. Did the committee take that into consideration?

Mr. ANDERSON. That particular question was not discussed in the report, but I am glad to discuss it here. The transportation situation probably more than any other really emphasizes the effect of this out-of-relation condition between the prices of farm products and the prices of other commodities, including transportation.

In order to get at just what happened in the matter of transportation and its relation to farm prices, the commission made a study, the purpose of which was to ascertain just how much freight was involved in the purchase of certain typical farm implements with either corn or wheat. We took four typical farm implements—a wagon, a corn harvester, a grain binder, and a gang plow—and determined the amount of freight actually represented by those implements in the cost of transportation on raw materials and also in the cost of transportation on the finished product from the point of manufacture to certain typical farm centers. In addition, we assumed that these implements would be paid for at these given points in wheat or corn, which was shipped to Chicago in order to obtain the cash. In other words, we assumed that the farmer would ship the corn or wheat to Chicago, and that his price would be the Chicago price, less the freight, and therefore that a part of the freight involved in the transaction was the freight on the corn or the wheat shipped to Chicago to obtain the cash with which to buy the implements.

These figures are worked out for a number of points, but for the purpose of this illustration I use Springfield, Ill., which is the least sensational, and Oklahoma City, Okla., which is perhaps the most. In 1913 these four farm implements at Springfield, including the freight, cost $441; in 1920, $874; in 1921, $700. At Oklahoma City they cost in 1913, $484.50; in 1920, $934; in 1921, $751. At Springfield, Ill., to buy these implements required in 1913 716 bushels of corn; in 1920, 583 bushels of corn; in 1921, 2,027 bushels of corn. At Oklahoma City, in 1913, to buy these implements required 932 bushels of corn; in 1920, 702 bushels of corn; and in 1921, 4,191 bushels of corn.

The freight on the corn required to buy these implements from Springfield, Ill., to Chicago in 1913 was $32; in 1920, $53; in 1921, $187. The freight on the corn from Oklahoma City in 1913 was $130; in 1920, $182; in 1921, $1,112.06. The total freight involved in the transaction—that is, the freight on the raw material in the implements, the freight on the implements from the point of manufacture to the point where the farmer bought them, and the freight on the corn from that point to Chicago—was, for Springfield, Ill., in 1913, $71.60; in 1920, $132.26; in 1921, $265.50. From Oklahoma City the total freight involved in the transaction in 1913 was $197.97; in 1920, $308.87; in 1921, $1,238.06. In other words, the total freight in the transaction, making the assumptions which I have made, at Oklahoma City was about $500 more than the actual cost of the implements themselves delivered there. Of course, not much corn is shipped to terminals as corn. For the most part it is shipped as live stock, but this illustration shows how freight costs pyramid when commodity prices get out of line with freight rates.

I think it is apparent that agriculture can not survive under such conditions, and in making that statement I do not make the statement that freight rates as they now stand on the agricultural products are necessarily too high. In my judgment, they are too high, but they are not as much too high as these figures would indicate; and the remedy for this situation is, primarily, in my judgment, not so much to bring the price of transportation down as it is in bringing the price of agricultural products up. I do not wish to be misunderstood there. I think the price of transportation on agricultural products is too high, as perhaps it is on many other basic commodities, but it would be misleading to say that it is as much too high as these illustrations which I have given would seem to indicate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, the reason for that was that in the last instance the transportation company would be transporting so many more bushels of corn than in the other instance, and the price in the last instance is not on a comparable basis with the price in the others.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the tremendous increase involved in the freight costs in this transaction is due, as the gentleman says, to the fact that with agricultural implements still remaining on a price basis considerably above 1913, and the agricultural products on a price basis at about 1913 or below, the number of bushels required to purchase the implements is so much larger that, of course, the freight on that number of bushels is increased several times.

Mr. BLACK. And, of course, the railroad company would put an additional cost of its own in transporting that number of bushels even though the cost of transportation had remained the same as in 1913.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose the purchase price of the implements in Oklahoma City had been the same in bushels of corn in 1921 that it was in 1913, what would be the comparative cost of freight?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am unable to give those figures. I have them, but not here.

Mr. STEVENSON. It would be very much higher still, however.

Mr. ANDERSON. Quite a lot, I should say; about 70 per cent, I imagine.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Recurring again to what the gentleman said was the value of the farmer's dollar in 1920, as compared with 1913, what was it?

Mr. ANDERSON. Sixty-three per cent in May, 1921.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The farmer's dollar would buy about 63 per cent as much transportation as it would before?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not necessarily, if consideration is given to the larger number of bushels which have to be transported to purchase the given article.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Including the cost of transportation, the purchase of transportation by the farmer's dollar is about what the purchase of these other commodities was?

Mr. ANDERSON. Providing the transportation is on the same level as the other commodities. In determining the all-commodity level, which was the basis of determining the value of the farmer's dollar, transportation was not included.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that in 1919 the imports of farm products greatly exceeded the imports of 1913. It was stated that there were 40,000,000 carcasses of frozen lambs imported into the country in 1919, a very large supply of wool, and a very large supply of hides. Would these imports affect the price of the farmers' products?

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably. Of course, the general statement that there was a large increase in imports of agricultural products would be subject to a great many exceptions and quite a number of modifications. The gentleman refers to the case of mutton. There was a very large import of mutton, amounting to about 100,000,000 pounds in 1920. It was about one-fifth of the total production, and unquestionably the importation of so large a part of the normal production of the country had a very marked effect upon the price of mutton in 1920. That statement, however, does not hold good as to commodities like wheat and corn.

After all, the farmers' interest in what happens to commodities does not end with disposing of them at the local market. It is quite clear that the price which the farmer receives for a commodity is in considerable measure dependent upon the costs which intervene between the price which he receives at the local market and the price which the ultimate consumer pays. In other words, there is a limit to what the ultimate consumer can be made to pay, and while all of the advantage which might result in higher prices to the consumer does not always go to the farmer, nor does all the advantage which might result from lowering the cost of distribution go to the farmer, still the price which he receives is, to a certain extent, dependent upon the cost of distribution which intervenes between him and the ultimate consumer. I do not want to go into the general question of distribution costs. That will be dealt with in another part of the report; but this I do want to say, and I am not expressing the conclusions of the commission but my own personal conclusions with respect to this matter. What I desire to say is this: That in my judgment the reforms in the distributive machinery and the lowering of the cost of distribution must begin with the farmer himself, and that it is largely a matter of better farm organization, both of production and of marketing. The whole tendency of present distributive methods is to concentrate the product in large quantities in a few centers of the country at long distances from the center of production. This means a large amount of unnecessary transportation haul, a large amount of unnecessary storage, insurance, and other charges, as well as a good deal of unnecessary handling. These farmer organizations should be cooperative, and, it seems to me, should be as far as possible along commodity lines. In other words, if it were possible so to organize the cotton farmers of a given district that they could produce or would produce a cotton of a given marketable quality, that cotton could be concentrated at a point close to the point of production and could go directly to the point of consumption without the intermediate concentrations which now occur. Also there intervene between producer and consumer many factors and elements which are largely the result of the complexities of modern civilization.

A number of gentlemen whom I think are best termed specialists do certain things in connection with distributive processes. They may grade a product or may sort it or may pack it or may bulk it for transportation to distant points. They may have to do with the matter of insurance or storage. All of them perform some character of service along the line. There is a good deal of this service which, in my judgment, the farmer can very well perform himself if he can organize himself for that purpose. The farmer loses a great deal in the price of his product by reason of the fact he puts it upon the market in such shape that it has to be handled by other people before it is sold for manufacturing purposes. If the farmer could so organize himself as to do his own sorting, grading, and bulking the product with reference to a definite fixed standard; in other words, if he can do what the industrial manufacturer does or which the owner of industrial products does, deliver his product to the buyer at the time and in the quantities and of the grade that the buyer requires, he can have just as much to say about the price that he receives as the industrial manufacturer does. In my judgment, until he is able to approximate that situation when he can deliver his product with the same efficiency as to delivery, quantity, and quality of the product, he will never have the same control over the prices or the same influence upon the prices that manufacturing industry has.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. FREAR. In reference to the last statement where the gentleman states that the farmer himself might be able to grade his grain by organization and association, how would that effect, for instance, the grading which is undertaken to-day in the State of Minnesota—for illustration, where there is complaint that undergrading is effected to the disadvantage of the farmer? Could that meet that situation as to this grading?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think he would be much better able to meet it. The farmer sells his product now as an individual in small lots just as it comes from the farm for the most part. Something has to be done with it to make it marketable.

Now, either some one else will do that sorting and grading and bulking, and take the profit for doing it, or else the farmer will organize and take the profit to himself for doing it. It seems to me that boils it down to this in the last analysis: If the farmer sells his stuff just as he gets it off the ground, and it is necessary that certain services be performed in connection with it before it is of a marketable character, and some one has to perform those services, the cost of those services will come out of the prices which the farmer receives. He not only loses that but he loses the added price which he would receive if the commodity was in a marketable condition before he sold. For instance, I have in mind the case of a man who shipped a carload of potatoes down to Atlanta, Ga. About one-half of those potatoes were unfit for sale. The result of it was that the farmer got, in the first place, the price of an inferior article. In the second place, he paid the freight upon one-half of a carload of potatoes for which he got nothing, and finally he paid for doing the sorting, which he ought to have done himself.

Mr. FREAR. I believe the gentleman has made very clear the duty of the farmer. The question arises whether or not, if the undergrading occurs to-day from those people who are engaged in it in Minneapolis or elsewhere, the farmer could meet that or not, and whether he could meet the tests that are provided there.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think he would be in much better condition to meet that situation if he were organized than he could possibly be as an individual. I think gentlemen who have had experience in Washington are quite well aware of the fact that those industries and those classes of people who are well organized have greater influence here than those who are unorganized. And I suspect that the same thing would be true in an economic sense. If farmers were organized, they would unquestionably have a larger influence, not only economically but politically.

Mr. TOWNER. The products of the farm, of course, are largely grain and meat products, and in that case it would be impossible, would it not, for the farmer to prepare his product for final purchase?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it is impossible, but I think it is difficult. It is especially difficult in this country, where the farmer is intensely an individualist, where he thinks he ought not to be required or require himself to surrender any part of that individualism in order that the class of farmers the country over or in his particular locality might be benefited.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman's idea is that in some of these things that I have mentioned, by cooperative association some of the difficulties could be overcome?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it reaches inevitably to the conclusion that whatever restriction exists in Federal laws as against cooperative organizations ought to be removed and State legislation ought to be passed giving cooperative organizations a legal status. I would not want to give the impression that this whole distributive problem can be solved by cooperative organization of farmers. I do not think it can be. I do think the initial step in reform of distributive processes ought to begin with better organization, both of production and of marketing, at the farmer end.

Mr. TOWNER. I entirely agree with what the gentleman has said, and I think we are all under great obligations to the gentleman for the wisdom and care with which evidently this examination has been made and the manner in which it has been presented. Can the gentleman make any suggestions, as the result of his investigation, along the line of selling agencies? For instance, for products such as can be prepared for the farmer's consumer?

Let me suggest this, that in a dairy country, where they are producing butter, and perhaps eggs as well as butter, as is generally the case in agricultural communities, if the product of the farmer's purchaser is put in shape so that it can be taken directly or sent directly to the consumer there must be, must there not, a selling agency which must be a cooperative selling agency, or some other kind? Has the gentleman any suggestions to make along that line? It occurs to me that that is quite an important matter, at least in the consideraion of a great many people now.

Mr. ANDERSON. Any conclusion I would express in connection with that matter would necessarily have to anticipate a full investigation, because it has primarily to do with marketing and transportation, upon which the commission has not completed its investigation and report. My own feeling in regard to farm organization is that there must be, first, a basic local organization. The basis of farm organization has to be the local cooperative association; these associations can be built up into larger units very much as has been done in the case of dairy products. I think the success of cooperation in dairy products is due to the fact that it began in the organization of the local creamery, and that it has been built into larger organizations with the local organization as the unit, and the larger association acting as a selling agency of the local cooperative associations. It is a singular thing in this connection that dairy products have declined less proportionately than almost any other. I think there is but one other exception. And, in my judgment, that is due primarily to the better organization of the dairy industry; first, because they are able to transfer the production of the raw material from milk to butter or from milk to cheese, as the demand requires; and, second, because their organization made possible a greater resistance to price reduction. And if you consider the course of price reduction throughout the United States you will find, speaking now generally, and admitting a large number of exceptions, that price reductions were least in those industries which were the best organized and which were, consequently, through control of production or otherwise, able to put up the largest resistance against price reduction.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the investigation reveal that much might be done in protecting the farmer and securing a better price for him, and also helping to solve the transportation problem, by a cooperative marketing organization that would find a market for the product within the territory or the zone in which it is produced?

If I may illustrate, I have a specific instance of where a farm product was produced at a given point and was handled 10 different times and then was consumed, without manufacture, without change, in the raw state, on the tables within half a mile of where it was first produced. In the meantime it had passed into another State, another city, another market, and then was returned again. That thing has taken place over and over again. We are shipping our stuff from one part of the country to another, for manufacture or otherwise, and then it comes back to the same point with all the transportation charges added both ways and the price to the consumer greatly increased and the price to the producer greatly decreased.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not any doubt that a very considerable part of the cost of distribution is due to an uneconomic relation between production and market; in other words, I think there is a very strong tendency in the country to-day to market products, whether agricultural or otherwise, upon a nation-wide scale, and in many instances you find industries shipping their products thousands of miles to market, where a market vastly in excess of their ability to supply it exists within a radius of three or four hundred miles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am about ready to quit.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether his investigation of the distribution of profits comprises all profits from the farmer to the purchaser of live stock or grain or other farm products, and from the local receiver or purchaser to the distributing wholesaler, for any considerable period?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say that an investigation of that character is under way now, and perhaps the Members of the House will be interested in knowing how that has been done. In the first place, we undertook that investigation in reference to farm products in connection with the study of transportation. In other words, we wanted to ascertain the relation between the cost of freight and the price which the producer received, and also its relation to the margin between what the farmer received at the local elevator and what was paid for the product at the terminal elevator.

In order to arrive at a conclusion upon that matter we appointed a committee composed of railroad men, representatives of industry, shippers' associations, and farmers, through whom a plan was adopted which was worked out substantially in this way: We secured, first, data showing the centers of production of the principal agricultural crops, some 28 of them in all, including grain, live stock, celery, cantaloupes, most of the perishables, and most of the staples. Then we determined the railroads carrying the major portion of this tonnage from the points of production to the point of consumption. With this information we worked out a series of questionnaires designed to go to the railroads, intended to develop this sort of information: The price of a given commodity at the local market; the price received for the same commodity at the terminal market; the freight on the product per unit, and the proportion that the freight rates bore to the price which the farmer received at the local market; the price paid at the terminal market, and the total spread between the local and the terminal markets.

That information is now in the process of compilation, and I have here a small chart which indicates the form in which this information is tabulated. This shows [indicating] in black the amount which the farmer received; in this grey color down here is shown the amount of freight, and this lighter margin above shows the margin between the price received by the farmer at the local elevator and the price received at the terminal elevator. Then, in addition to that, we are endeavoring to get the spread all the way through.

In this connection there have been a large number of studies made with a view to following through, for instance, a bushel of wheat from the producer to the ultimate consumer of the bread made out of it. All of these investigations have fallen down at some point or other. They fall down because the particular load of wheat which the farmer sells is immediately and necessarily, no doubt, mixed with other loads of wheat in the local elevator.

It is further mixed when it reaches the terminal; it is mixed with other grades of wheat, for which a different price was paid, in the mill. From that point on, as it goes through the wholesaler and retailer, it is absolutely impossible to allocate to the particular loaf of bread that you or I eat the amount of the overhead of the wholesaler and the grocer and the transportation that ought to be charged to that particular loaf of bread, and impossible to tell just how much the wheat in that loaf of bread cost in the original primary market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I have another minute?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is necessary at all, for the purposes of his investigation, to preserve the identity of the individual bushel of wheat or load of wheat? If he has a carload of the same quality and grade of wheat from the same station, can not the purposes of this investigation be ascertained as satisfactorily as if they had preserved the identity of the single load or bushel of wheat?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it can be, and everybody who has tried it comes to the same conclusion. I do not mean by that that I do not think it is possible to obtain the information that the gentleman is seeking.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Could he not get it with very approximate accuracy?

Mr. ANDERSON. I doubt it very much. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed I will tell you what we did do. In this effort to allocate the costs of distribution the commission did not feel that it was justified in following methods which had failed when tried by others, so we started at the other end. In other words, we took the loaf of bread, or the pound of beefsteak, or the package of breakfast food, or the can of tomatoes in the local grocery store and undertook to work back from that to the original producer. In making that effort we appointed, for instance, in the case of the retail grocer, a committee representing the various retail grocers' associations, and in cooperation with them we worked out a questionnaire which went to something like a thousand representative retail grocers in the United States. That questionnaire shows the price paid by the grocer for some twenty-odd staple grocery products and the price which he received from the consumer for those products from 1913 down to date. In addition, it gives some other information in regard to the cost of doing business, the total volume, the wage cost, and other items which would be indicative of the reason for the higher spreads which might occur at one period than another.

Then we took the same commodities and worked out a questionnaire which we sent to the wholesaler. Having gotten the information from the wholesaler as to the spread that occurred between the price which he paid and the price which he received from the retail grocer we went back to the canner, and from the canner we got the figures showing the amount paid for cans, the amount of labor cost, and the amount paid the original producer.

In that way we expect to be able to come very close to showing exactly how much toll is taken by each factor along the line of distribution between the producer and the consumer. I should say that most of that information is now in, with the exception of some which has to be obtained from manufacturers of cotton goods and manufacturers of woolen goods.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There has been a great deal of complaint, especially among the wheat growers, and it seems more especially those in the Northwest, about the grain-grading system. It seems that they have had a custom of grading down wheat that had an excess of moisture or that had an excess of foreign matter, whether separable or inseparable, and if it had either of those, of grading it down to the basis of the wheat that had all of those things. In other words, they would take perfectly good wheat, weighing say 60 or 61 pounds to the bushel, that had no foreign matter in it but had simply a little excess of moisture, and grade it on the same basis as wheat that was of a low grade, on account of excessive moisture and on account of foreign matter, and that grading would determine the amount received by the farmer. Has the gentleman's committee investigated the basis that thus enables the local buyers to buy fine wheat at a low price, and then by mixing it run it up to a higher price?

Mr. ANDERSON. If there is any abuse in the matter to which the gentleman refers, it is due to the character of the grades and not to the application of the grades.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Perhaps that is true in a measure, and yet the Bureau of Standards claim that the grading system is perfect, and that its abuses occur in the application of the grading system.

Mr. ANDERSON. If they make that claim I do not agree with them. However, I will say that the commission did not make any particular investigation of the question of grain grading.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that the evidence that was taken before one of the committees showed that they paid 30 or 40 cents a bushel less to the farmer for wheat of the identical grade as wheat ultimately sold on the basis of wheat that had been purchased for 30 or 40 cents a bushel higher.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And that the middleman between would mix that wheat with other wheat or dry it out and so get the higher price.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think we have facts and figures even more startling than those which the gentleman has given.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is there not another factor along the route from the producer to the consumer, and that is the man who succeeds in getting hold of a lot of a commodity and storing it for a length of time for the purpose of obtaining a higher price, for instance as wool is stored in the city of New York? Has the gentleman's committee investigated or does his committee expect to investigate that particular factor that enters into the cost?

Mr. ANDERSON. We have some data upon that question. It is very difficult, however, to obtain sound data going to show the extent of storage in the country and the extent to which storage is used for the purpose of manipulating prices either up or down.

Mr. KING. I know that.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to say that I am gratified to know of the interest the gentleman has taken in the agricultural people, agriculture being the fundamental business of this country upon which all its prosperity depends. I have tried to vote as best I could with the agricultural people, the farming interests, but have had some difficulty because they have a number of organizations and we can not always tell just when a particular organization is really interested in the farmer. I should like to inquire of the gentleman if he believes that the measures for which we have voted here to help the farmers have been of any material benefit to them? I hope they have.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think they have been of material benefit. They have been of greater benefit in some sections of the country than in others. That is due to the fact that bankers in some sections of the country have, perhaps, understood their responsibility to the public better than they have in other sections of the country. But take it on the whole, I think it can be said unhesitatingly that the measures so far adopted have had very marked influence upon the situation.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Has the gentleman's commission made any investigation to ascertain whether or not the desire of the public for convenience has had any effect in decreasing the price which could be paid to the producer? For instance, half a dozen people live on one block, and each family will telephone to a different butcher shop in the forenoon for meat, and there will be half a dozen different deliveries and half a dozen different distributing agencies. Does not that tend to cut down the price that can be paid ultimately to the original producer, because there is a maximum price at which the consumer will quit buying? Has the gentleman's commission investigated that or is there any way to do so?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is being investigated, and it is unquestionably a factor, but the extent to which it is a factor we can not say at this time. I think we will be able to indicate with some degree of correctness to what extent the complexity of service is a factor in the cost to the ultimate consumer and the price to the producer.

Mr. BEGG. Am I right in the statement that the more overhead you add on to meet the public desire naturally forces a lower price to the producer?

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not state it in any other way except to say that undoubtedly the price which the farmer receives is in some degree affected by all the costs that intervene between him and the consumer. On the whole, however, I think it will be found that the cost of the service, and particularly the cost of the service connected with retail sales, is passed on to the consumer rather than to the producer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. On behalf of the gentleman from Wyoming I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. For instance, I venture to say you will find a wide variation in prices for the same article between certain stores in the city of Washington who give no service—the self-service stores—and those in the Northwest where they will deliver anything from a spool of thread to a thrashing machine; where people expect to get and do get a high degree of service, delivery, convenience, dependability, environment, credit, and all other things which go to make up the ultimate price which the people who demand service have to pay. You will find there is a wide variation between the prices of the same thing in any city, depending very largely on the character of the service that goes with it.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. In the short discussion by the gentleman on cotton, does the gentleman have in mind the local organization such as they have in the sugar factory? For instance, the sugar-factory management will make a survey of the soil, buy seed in the open market in large quantities, the same kind of seed in every respect as the locality requires, and will lay out certain acreage for individuals, depending on whether they can fulfill the contract or not, and then in the last analysis pay on the percentage of sugar in the beet, and have the beets delivered at a certain point over a certain period of time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no doubt that that sort of an organization is advantageous, and if developed would reduce the ultimate cost.

Now, there is one matter that I have not discussed and which I would like to discuss for a few minutes. That is a thing very apparent, namely, that there is a hiatus or gap between short-time credit, which is furnished by the deposit banks, and long-time credit, which is furnished by the banks and by mortgage loan companies and institutions of that kind to farmers. It is quite clear that the present banking machinery of the country is not adapted to the farmers' requirements.

The fundamental requirement of agricultural credit is that the note or obligation must be of such maturity that when it becomes due it can be paid not by making another note but out of the proceeds of the farm. That requires a longer period of maturity than the six months which is now allowed in the case of paper discounted with the Federal reserve bank. That is to say, we must find some means to make it possible for the farmer to get a production credit of a sufficient length of maturity that he can pay the note when it becomes due out of the proceeds of the farm. That means paper running from six months to perhaps three years. The principal reason which prevents bankers from taking paper of such maturity now is that there is no way by which the banker can get the money on the paper if it becomes necessary for him to get it before the paper becomes due. In other words, so long as the banker finds it impossible to get money on the paper before maturity, if he needs it, he is going to be unwilling to make loans of that length of maturity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. I will yield the gentleman, on behalf of the gentleman from Wyoming, five minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the Chair how the time has been occupied so far?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming has used 160 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee 47 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman from Tennessee has some one whom he desires to yield to, I am content to stop at this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Here is the situation: The gentleman proposed to yield the gentleman five minutes more. I merely wanted to even up the time if I could. I do not object to the gentleman having five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. ANDERSON. In order to meet this situation it is necessary to provide a facility through which this paper of longer maturity can be discounted so that the banker can raise the necessary cash if he needs it. There are three ways by which that can be done. One is to create in the Federal land banks a farm credit department for that purpose. Another is to create an entirely new agency for the purpose, and another way is to modify the War Finance Corporation in such a way as to enable it to do that sort of business. My own judgment about it is that the fairest plan is to create in the Federal land banks a farm credits department having authority to discount for banks—State and national, incorporated live-stock associations, all banking institutions—paper of this character. This paper would be made the basis of an issue of short-time debentures, just as farm mortgages are now made the basis of farm loan bonds under the present farm loan system.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. In considering methods by which the situation could be reached, which has been described, has the gentleman thought of in some way permitting farmers themselves by deposits to create a fund which may from year to year be enlarged and which would in a way enable them to finance themselves rather than to simply sell their credit?

Mr. ANDERSON. I know what the gentleman has in mind, and I think that is properly a matter for State legislation. What I think we need, so far as this longer-time credit is concerned, is nothing more nor less than a reserve bank through which this paper can be discounted and through which the farmer can reach the investment pool of the country. In other words, it is not going to help a great deal, it seems to me, to get into the deposit pool with this sort of a scheme, because the farmer can get into that now. What he needs to have is a new source of credit, and the only way that he can develop a new source of credit is to get into a field to which he does not now have access for purposes of loans of this maturity.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Did the gentleman's investigation disclose whether there is an actual shortage of investment money for farmers in the agricultural sections of our country?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know just what the gentleman means by a shortage. This is what has happened in the agricultural sections of the country so far as we are able to ascertain. The reductions in loans and discounts—that is, in agricultural communities—is about 1.2 per cent from May 4, 1920, to April 28, 1921. In the same time deposits have decreased in those same communities by 20 per cent. If the gentleman can conceive a condition of that kind without a real demand for additional farm credits, he can do more than I can.

Mr. McFADDEN. Did the gentleman's investigation disclose what percentage of assets of the financial institutions in rural communities was loaned to the farmers?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not in that form. So far as we are able to ascertain, the proportion of total loans and discounts of all banks which go to farmers either in long-time mortgage loans or in short-time loans, either with or without collateral, is approximately 18 per cent; that is, about 18 per cent of the total loans and mortgages are farm loans. Singularly enough that corresponds with the percentage of the national income which the farmer gets.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 233) providing for the postponement of the World's Dairy Congress.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TEN EYCK].

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation which the chairman of our commission, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], has given in regard to how we conducted our hearing and inquiries, and the deductions which were made therefrom. I am going to deal with it from an entirely different standpoint. I have jotted down some recommendations that I intend to make, which I feel, if carried into execution, will not only be beneficial to the farming industry of the country, but will be beneficial to the entire country and the consuming public. It is my idea that the big cause of the trouble with the agricultural communities to-day is the great cost of spread. I mean by that the difference between the price that the producer sells his products for and the price that the consumer pays for that same article. There are a number of things that enter into that. Waste is one of them. That, of course, can be taken care of to a great extent by the farmer himself, as well as the middlemen who handle his products.

The agricultural industry of the United States produces no less than one-fifth of the total annual income of the Nation when reckoned in dollars. If the farmer received a just compensation for money invested and labor performed it would materially exceed this percentage of the total national income.

The farming industry bears the same relation to the Nation as the heart bears to the human body. The railways, the highways, and the waterways bear the same relation to the Nation as the veins and arteries bear to the body. It is the farm that fills the veins and arteries with commerce and makes the world's business life throb with success, the same as the heart fills the veins and arteries of the human body with life's blood. Therefore, we must not let our agricultural life deteriorate, nor permit the transportation system of the country to become inoperative or too costly for use for any purpose whatsoever. If we do, the very life of the Nation will suffer and the people will be made to bear untold hardships and burdens.

There are three great forces which are accountable for the health, prosperity, and progress of the human races; one of which is finance, the second is labor, and the third is the farming industry. I can best demonstrate to you the relativity between these three great forces by comparing the United States to a large beehive resting upon a tripod, one leg of which represents capital, the second labor, and the third the farmers of this country.

Capital by organizing has made its leg a superleg, labor by organizing has made its leg a superleg, and the farmers by not organizing have permitted their leg to remain weak, and as a tripod is no stronger or more stable than its weakest leg, the beehive or the Nation has become unsteady and the business of the country shaky.

Before this condition can be corrected the farming industry of the country will have to organize so that it will take its rightful place among the other enterprises and thus assume its share of the weight of the responsibilities of the Nation's problems and help to stabilize the commercial interests of the country.

There are many things that have been denied the farmer in the past which have prevented him from assuming his share of the responsibilities of government. All of these will be corrected when the farmers' organizations become big enough and strong enough to be on a parity and deal with capital and labor on equal terms, not for selfish interests but to cooperate with the other two to accomplish that which is for the best interest and for the benefit of all the people.

The farmers in not having been thoroughly organized in the past have been placed at a disadvantage in practically every one of their various vocations. Their lack of organization is due to the fact that their business is composed of small units which are scattered over the entire country. On that account they have been obliged to compete separately, or in small units, with well-organized capital and well-organized labor. Furthermore, the farmers sell nearly all of their products through innumerable middlemen, who absorb practically all of their profits, while the other captains of the other industries of the Nation, such as manufacturers, merchants, and transportation interests, conduct their business on a larger scale and in a more scientific and more economical manner; nearly all of these have organized efficient selling agencies so that they sell as directly to the consumer as possible.

The farmer to insure his property has been forced to establish mutual insurance companies, which are not able in all localities to render full protection to the assured. Stock companies in many instances refused to insure the farmer, and when they do insure him they charge exorbitant rates. From personal experience on my own farm I am able to insure only one-fifth of the insured valuation in mutual companies. In order to secure adequate protection I have had to coax the stock companies to accept the other four-fifths at a much higher insurance rate.

When the farmer requires a short-term loan or mortgage he is often forced to apply to individuals and local institutions who charge high rates of interest because the banks in that particular locality are reluctant to take farmer paper as they can not discount it as readily in the larger institutions in the great money centers of the world.

I do not intend to go into the matter of farm credits in detail at this time as the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry will deal more fully on farm credits and banking in a subsequent report.

The farmer has been the greatest sufferer from increased freight rates. This is principally due to his location, long hauls, low price on bulky commodities, perishable products, and small marginal profit. I do not intend to go deeper into this side of the question at this time, as the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry will make a special report on transportation.

The marketing of the farmer's products is costly, unsatisfactory, and uneconomical, because the farmer is generally at the mercy of the buyer, as it is his practice to sell his goods at the point of delivery rather than at the point of shipment. The cost of spread in some instances amounts to 1,000 per cent increase between the price the producer receives for his commodity and the price that the consumer pays for it. This is the real cause of the present high cost of living and the deplorable financial condition of the farmer to-day. I will not attempt at this time to give all the causes of the high cost of spread in detail, as this matter will be covered more fully by a subsequent report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry on marketing.

The same thing is also true of the farmer in practically all of his purchases, as he not only pays the cost of the production, together with the profit, on all the things he consumes, but pays the freight in addition, as well as the cost of marketing the other man's goods.

There are four fundamental changes or revisions which will have to be made in the agricultural industry to insure permanent improvement:

First. Authorization for cooperative bargaining.

Second. The establishment of a proper and adequate farm-credit and banking system.

Third. The creation of an efficient marketing system.

Fourth. The establishment of reasonable transportation rates, sufficient and efficient transportation service, and a proper system of highway construction leading from the farms to the markets and railroad terminals.

After the big four have been taken care of the other smaller improvements to agricultural conditions will follow in their order of importance and corrected in their turn through the force of cooperation, first with themselves and later with finance and labor.

It has been asserted by various individuals at different times that the farmer ought not to organize to influence legislation. I take exception to this statement by able public men. Financial interests have used their experts to present their views on the different problems of the day at various times. For the sake of argument, I will admit that it has been for what they believed to be for the best interest of the business industry of this country. Labor has sent to the legislative halls of the various States of the Union, as well as to the House of Congress, their representatives to educate the legislators as regards the needs of labor in this country, which they both had a right to do. Therefore, why should there now be objection to the various agricultural organizations, representing such a vast taxable property, the basic industry of the country, and millions of our best citizens, in sending their representatives to the Halls of Congress to present their opinions and recommendations as regards what they think is for their best interest, as well as for the best interest of the people of the entire country?

Mr. Chairman, the greatest argument that I can present to you to-day in favor of the farmers organizing and teaching the legislators of this country the farmer's problems, the farmer's interests, the farmer's needs, is the report which the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, of which I have the honor and pleasure of being a member, have presented to you to-day; for this commission would never have been created, nor the report made, nor the numerous other problems of the farmers considered, if they had not knocked at the doors of Congress through their national Representatives and demanded an equal and square deal at the hands of Congress.

I, for one, am always willing and glad to welcome in my office and give hearing to the financier's representative, labor's representative, and the farmer's representative at any time on any bill in which they are interested, as I am desirous of learning the various viewpoints of the different interests on all legislation, so that I may act intelligently for the best interests of the entire country.

Before closing I wish to insert in the RECORD additional suggested changes for improvements in the agricultural situation as it exists to-day for the consideration of Congress, the legislatures of the various States, the people of the country, as well as the farmers themselves, and to recommend that each do that which comes within their respective power or jurisdiction for the relief of the farmers of the country.

I have come to the conclusion that the country, as a whole, must assist the farmer in reducing the great cost of spread which is the crux of his unfortunate position, as well as the high cost of living to-day, both of which have been brought about by a great many different causes. What the farmer is entitled to is a fair return on money invested and labor performed, and at the same time be enabled to sell his products to the consumer at a reasonable price; but due to the great cost of spread neither of these things are true to-day.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I yield.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. As one who was born and raised on a farm, who has heard all of the woes of the farmers from beginning up until now, of the remedies suggested for his relief and the necessity for some relief, I have listened with interest to what the gentleman has said about the cost of spread. Now, how is the gentleman going to do away with the spread? How can the farmer sell his stuff direct to the consumer and get the price that his labor warrants? What can he do to get results without reference to preachments?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will answer the gentleman. The farmer can best get closer to the consumer by cooperative bargaining, by cooperation in selling. He can cut down the cost of production and make a larger profit by cooperative buying.

Under the heading "Cooperative bargaining," I wish to recommend that proper permissive laws be passed both by the Federal Government and the various States and the farmers organize thoroughly to take advantage to the fullest extent possible of cooperative buying, cooperative selling, cooperative manufacturing and canning plants, cooperative cheese and butter factories, cooperative storage plants, cooperative grain elevators and warehouses, cooperative packing houses.

Under the heading "The establishment of a proper and adequate farm credit and banking system" I wish to recommend that a suitable banking system be inaugurated to give to the agricultural industry of the country the same banking facilities, in accordance with the turnover of its various products, that all other industries of the country receive to-day.

There is a great need for the extension of time on discount loans to the farmer from six months to three years. The farmer should be assured at all times of a reasonably low rate of interest on farm mortgages through the Federal land bank, as well as a reasonable interest rate on all his short-time loans through all the banking institutions, farm loan associations, and cattle loan corporations throughout the country. This will encourage the farmer to own his own farm and thus cut down the increased tendency toward tenantry.

That so-called short-time loans be furnished to the farmer from six months to three years to meet their requirements, extending the time of loan to meet the time of the turnover on their various products.

That the banking system of the country be so organized that all the banks that loan to the farmers will obtain discount facilities to the fullest extent possible commensurate with the security which they present.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will yield.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I had a farmer come to me not long ago and he said, "GOODYKOONTZ, the worst thing in the world you can do for the farmer is to loan him money." Well, I take that cum grano salis. I know the farmer has to have a little money once in a while, but what I can not understand is this: We have got banks all over the country, banks in every county in the country. I am president of a little national bank, and have been for nearly 20 years, and the best paper we get is farmers' paper, and we never charge them more than 6 per cent interest. We have notes that have been going on for years and years which we have never called, because we know they are secure and amply secure, the best paper we have got in the bank. Now, what does the farmer need in the way of banking facilities that he already has not? Please state that so that we can legislate here in the interest of the farmer on the financial proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. TEN EYCK. My suggestion to that would be that the gentleman's bank have a model made of it and send it to all the other banks of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have reason to believe the farmers' paper in every county in every State of the Union is regarded as good, the best that can be had.

Mr. TEN EYCK. That a medium of discount be established for all the banks which loan to the farmers, so that farm paper will have discount rights in the Federal reserve bank.

That suitable provision be made for discounting farm paper on warehouse receipts and loans of cattle-loan corporations, as well as farm paper in all banks of the country, member banks, nonmember banks, and State banks.

That the reserve bank be authorized to rediscount farm paper for the full time of the turnover of the farmer's products which has been accepted as collateral on his loan at the local banks other than what is known as the three-year turnover of the cattle-raising industry.

That a suitable and adequate financial bureau be established in the farm loan bank for three-year credit for the cattle-raising industry.

That all the banks rediscounting farm or other paper be restricted as to the amount of additional interest they charge to their farmer and other customers, over that which they pay to the revenue or rediscount bank.

That banking facilities be provided for the farmer so that his products can be utilized for basic credit to the fullest extent possible, and the banks accept loans with proper warehouse certificates as collateral.

That suitable and adequate facilities be furnished to discount agricultural paper for the full length of the time of the turnover of the product on which the original loans are made.

That Federal assistance be rendered through established institutions to help the cattle loan corporations and cooperative loan associations.

When this has been accomplished the farmer will have the necessary domestic credits.

Under the heading "The creation of an efficient and adequate marketing system," I wish to suggest that we consider under domestic marketing, first, local, intrastate, and interstate distribution of agricultural products; secondly, the export of our surplus products.

That public markets be established in each of our cities for the mutual use of the farmer and the consumer.

That suitable accommodations for interstate marketing be established with the view to reducing the cost of distribution, so as to lower the cost of spread between the producer and the consumer.

That suitable and adequate joint terminal facilities be established, connecting the railways, waterways, and highways, and at the various terminals suitable machinery be installed to handle the farmer's products. Proper warehouse and grain elevators be built and located at big terminal centers and at export harbors so as to accommodate the farmer's products while en route for export.

That a branch of our merchant marine be properly equipped and organized to carry farm products, and transatlantic and Pacific waterway routes be established to properly take care of the export of our surplus agricultural products.

That attachés or Government agents be located in each of the American consular agencies abroad, whose duty it will be to obtain information as regards the farming industry of that particular locality or country and obtain authentic information as regards the amounts of crops raised, the amount of produce stored, the amount of food consumed, the amount imported by the Government where he is located, and from whom imported, and the amount imported from the United States, together with such other information as regards the method of growing the various crops, the kinds of seeds used, and the kind of food consumed in his particular locality; what pests are prevalent, and the nature of the eradication of same.

That the farmers cooperate in establishing and building cooperative warehouses to carry their produce from the season of production over the entire season of consumption.

That the farmer standardize his produce by proper grading of his products as well as the standardization of the containers therefor, which will permit him to extend his operation of selling more direct to the consumer throughout the entire country as well as through local agents.

That the farmers organize for cooperative bargaining.

That an improved system of highways be inaugurated and the necessary assistance rendered by the Federal Government, the State, county, and town for the purpose of building roads to connect up the farms with transportation terminals and local markets.

Under the heading of "Transportation" the establishment of reasonable transportation rates, sufficient and efficient transportation service, and a proper system of highway construction leading from the farms to the markets and railroad terminals to accommodate the farmers' needs at all seasons of the year.

That railroad rates be reduced on farm products systematically and scientifically, giving due regard to the localities of production and the localities of consumption.

That proper and efficient service be rendered to the farming and rural communities at all seasons of the year.

That adequate and efficient merchant marine and trans-Atlantic and Pacific water routes be established for the use of agricultural interests.

That inland waterways, harbors, and waterway routes within the territory of the United States connecting the Great Lakes and the interior with the Atlantic Ocean be given the proper attention and improvements.

That joint terminal facilities of all four warehouses and grain elevators be built in convenient places.

That proper machinery for loading and unloading of agricultural products be installed at way stations, freight houses, terminals, and harbors for the use of the farmer.

That suitable and adequate joint terminal facilities be installed connecting the waterway, railway, and highway, and sufficient and efficient terminals and proper warehouses and elevators be located at export ports to accommodate farm products en route.

In addition to the big four, I believe it necessary that labor supply bureaus be established both by the Federal Government and the various States where a record may be kept of unemployed farm labor and where a farmer may apply for efficient and competent help.

That a national endeavor be made for improvement in production by the use of the best seeds, blooded cattle, poultry, and so forth, and that a system of diversified crops be inaugurated.

That information as regards soil treatment in the various localities, improved crop treatment, and the utilization of the latest type of machinery.

Under the heading "Living conditions," I wish to recommend that the farmer should be permitted to make a fair return on money invested and labor performed so that he may improve the rural school system of his locality.

That his children will receive the proper academic training for a higher agricultural college education. He should have his living conditions raised to the level of his city brethren by having modern heating, sanitary plumbing, improved modern lighting, rural mail delivery, rural telephone service, improved highways, community attractions, convenient churches, all of which will tend to give him a better social intercourse with his neighbors, and lessen the work of the women folks on the farm.

That the farmers inaugurate a system of cost accounting so that he may ascertain what crops are most profitable in his locality with the purpose of growing that which is best adapted to their particular sections. The simpler the system of cost accounting the better. This should be accomplished with as little expenditure of time as possible.

I am pleased to set forth the various items which should be considered in cost accounting:

Production by farm labor: Planting and sowing, harvesting, and storing.

Purchases: Seeds; implements and machinery; food supplies; marketing; financing; fuel for heat, light, and power—coal, oil, and electricity.

Total investment: Interest on capital, taxes, insurance and repairs, management and supervision.

[Applause.]

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURROUGHS). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], chairman of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, who has addressed the House, and my associates on the commission are entitled to the thanks of the Congress and of the country for the effort which has been made to discover what the ills of agriculture are and the causes which are responsible for them.

In this connection, gentlemen, as this is the first opportunity I have had, I want to thank the House for having designated me as one of the two Democrats from the House to serve on that commission.

It ought to be very evident, gentlemen, that we have reached that condition under which generalities with reference to agriculture must be abandoned for a specific and definite constructive program with regard thereto. Henceforth agriculture must be recognized as a business in the economic and governmental policy of this country just as other productive activities are recognized as businesses out of which men have the right to make money, and be dealt with as such. The character of the business of agriculture is such, its hazards and the periods of its turnover are such that an economic and financial policy which meets the requirements of commerce and industry, we find, are not adjusted to meet the needs of agriculture. During the past three-quarters of a century we have been so absorbed in city building and have so trained our minds to think in the terms of a city-dominated commerce that many of us, when we find that the provisions which have been made to carry forward the businesses of the city do not suffice for agriculture, are disposed to conclude that there is something abnormal about the business of agriculture.

There is nothing strange or abnormal about it except in the sense that it is different.

In order that I may myself not be guilty of dealing in generalities I desire to submit for your consideration the specific things which to my mind are required in order to make possible the organization of agriculture upon a business basis.

We hear a great deal of talk about there being too much spread between what the farmer receives and what the consumer pays; that there is a long line of physical movement in agricultural distribution; and that the commodities moving into great concentration centers to be distributed therefrom are frequently hauled back over the same route over which they moved into those concentration centers. We hear a great deal about the violation of business principles in what are known as "crop movement" periods, the multiplicity of profits, and of the big physical waste after production. All this is deplored. I submit that it will not be possible to have an orderly and economical distribution of agricultural commodities until those commodities capable of standardization are standardized with reference to the requirements for use; that is to say, that each considerable quantity of each commodity, which quantity possesses distinctive characteristics determinative of the use to which it is best adapted, shall be given a specific grade term so that that particular sort of commodity may be bought and sold by its descriptive grade term. Commodities so standardized would have a general trade status while still at the points of first concentration.

No substantial progress can be made toward an economical distribution until agricultural commodities can move under prior sale from the points of first concentration to the points of use, but such movement is not possible unless they can be sold by grade.

Second. There must be warehouse facilities where these commodities can not only be concentrated but protected from storm damage and under proper regulation, have warehouse receipts issued therefor which shall carry a guaranty both as to physical protection and integrity of grade classification.

Third. There must be provided an agricultural produce-exchange system through which these commodities, properly standardized and warehoused, may be sold by grade. In other words, to establish a marketing machinery through which they can be put in trade contact with the general market while still at the points of first concentration.

Fourth. There is also required a chattel credit system in addition to the present credit facilities provided by commercial banks, which additional credit system will draw its capital from the general investing energy of the country as distinguished from money received on deposit, so as to avoid, for the commodities carried for orderly sale, having the loans called by reason of the necessity of the loaning agency to collect at such a time as to force these commodities on the market in quantities in excess of the ability of the market to absorb; and Fifth. That these four be so related as to function as a unit.

Fail to provide either of these or fail to coordinate them so that they may function as a unit would be like leaving a span out of a bridge, or of building all the spans but having them located at different points along the stream.

I appreciate fully the difficulty of providing that which is suggested, but I have investigated the matter as thoroughly as it is possible for me to investigate it, and I am fully convinced that no insurmountable difficulties will be met. The fact is that the utility and workability of everything that is suggested has already been demonstrated. We have made considerable progress in standardization. We would have made more rapid progress in standardization, especially with reference to commodities dealt in on "future board" exchanges if we had not been limited in the number and character of grades established by the fact that with reference to "future board" transactions delivery is entirely at the option of the seller, whereas in purchases for use the character of the commodity delivered must be determined absolutely by the buyer, for the very evident reason that the buyer for use has in contemplation, if it be raw material which he is purchasing, a specific character of commodity which he expects to produce, and necessarily must determine the character of raw material to be delivered to him on his purchases.

When the commission shall have proceeded further with its report I hope to have the opportunity of discussing in detail these specific suggestions made. At this time I want to say that I do not have in contemplation that Government shall provide all of these facilities. In so far as the National Government is concerned, I have in mind the rendition of a service with regard to sale and distribution similar to the service rendered through the Department of Agriculture with regard to production and the preservation of soil fertility. I have in mind the utilization of the departments of agriculture of the several States and a general extension and coordination of national and State laws with reference to warehouses and the regulations governing such warehouses.

It is agreed that cooperative agricultural organizations must have a large share in the constructive work which is required to be done, and that the duty of government should extend only to the provision of those public facilities necessary to give the farmers themselves an opportunity to apply business methods to their business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself three minutes more.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GENSMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman what his commission has done in regard to relieving the cotton situation of Oklahoma and the South?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The commission, strictly speaking, as the gentleman understands, has only the power of investigation and report. But it did take cognizance of the cotton situation last fall in a more or less informal way, and at my suggestion. Prior to my selection as a member of the commission I had been engaged, as had many others, in an effort to bring to cotton a new financial support and the support of a national purpose not to permit the cotton crop of this year to be sacrificed; if possible, to avoid the sacrifice. As you gentlemen know, we had already procured the renewal of the War Finance Corporation and provided it with authority to use a billion dollars. I had "peddled" the idea around among the Members of Congress, those who represented the sections which sold mules in the South, the representatives of manufacturing sections, and so forth, that if the debt-paying and the purchasing power of the South could be renewed, we could help business in their sections, and that cotton held the key to the situation. Everybody seemed willing to help. When the suggestion was made to the commission on the first day of its session that every effort should be made to avoid the crisis which seemed imminent, the commission appointed a subcommittee to see what could be done; in fact, the subcommittee was given full authority to proceed. I was designated as chairman of that subcommittee and immediately left for the cotton section to get first-hand information as to conditions, and particularly as to how much financial support the institutions of the South could be expected to give, to what degree and in what way they would cooperate in a general effort to save the cotton situation, and so forth. I got in touch with bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and farmers, and brought back to Washington unmistakable evidence supporting the position that unless a new financial support was provided the entire crop, however small, would come on the market at one time, bringing practically the entire carry over of American cotton with it.

The definite information procured was laid before the War Finance Corporation, Mr. Hoover, the Federal reserve bank officials, and others. Many conferences were had. Finally a conference was held in Washington, attended by officials of the Federal Reserve Board, the governors of the five Federal reserve banks serving southern territory, the governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, the Director of the War Finance Corporation, a group of New York bankers, and myself as chairman of the subcommittee on cotton of the joint commission.

At this conference it was agreed that the Federal reserve banks would rediscount, up to 80 per cent of the value of the cotton, paper secured by cotton; the War Finance Corporation agreed to support the market with as much of the billion dollars at its disposal as was necessary to make possible the orderly marketing of the current crop and the carry over. The New York bankers agreed to raise a cotton "pool" if necessary. A statement was issued to that effect.

After this was done the chairman of the subcommittee on cotton made another trip through the South, holding conferences in Atlanta, Memphis, and other points with representative bankers, merchants, and farmers, seeking to develop a united local support for cotton. While this was done, as I say, more or less informally by the commission, and at no expense to the commission or to the Government, as a southern man I feel deeply grateful to my colleagues on the commission that the first subcommittee created to deal with any commodity was created to deal with cotton. And however large or small may have been the service which my associates and myself on this subcommittee may have been able to render, a large part of it was due to the prestige given to us by the commission as the ones selected to represent the commission in this matter.

It would perhaps be interesting to outline the condition which confronted the cotton farmers last year. Everyone will recall that the crop condition continued to decline from the time of the first report, but the market also continued to decline in the face of constant reduction of estimated yield. As we neared the beginning of the harvest in the face of this decline, a conference was held in Washington with a number of the larger eastern cotton manufacturers to see if they could not be induced to make sufficient quantity purchases to stop the decline before the new crop came on the market. They said they could not afford to make such purchases and expressed the opinion that cotton would go to 8 cents per pound.

It was a fact that at that time we had a very large carry over of American cotton. European buyers who had been accustomed to financing two-thirds of our crop, by reason of the effect of the war, could no longer make quantity purchases even. That threw that much additional load back on us. Our southern banks were loaded to the limit, our merchants were in debt, and our farmers exhausted. Everybody told me when I was in the South that not only would they be unable to market the current crop gradually but that they could not hold the carry over off the market longer than fall. The mills were either closed or running on short time. Under that condition the fact of a short crop would have no chance to operate on prices.

Nothing could give the fact of a short crop the possibility of operating on prices, except a general attitude of support so definite and an available sum of money so large that everybody in the world would know that the crop did not have to be sacrificed. That condition is what the subcommittee on cotton of the joint commission tried by every means at its command to help create. I know that I gave about two months of my time to the neglect of everything else except the most important official matters.

In this connection I also want to express my very great appreciation for the support in this crisis given by the Federal reserve banks serving southern territory, the War Finance Corporation, the officials of the Federal reserve bank system, and by my colleagues in Congress from every section of the Nation. The condition among my people is not good in any section and is distressing in the extreme in many sections, but it is nothing as compared to what it would have been if the cotton crop had gone on the market under general enforced liquidation and cotton had brought around 10 cents per pound. I have discussed this at some length to show that there is something that the Government can do and something the people must do. If the people had not raised a small crop of cotton, nothing could have held prices up. But if they had not had support the small crop could not have had its effect in full degree upon prices.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. On behalf of the gentleman from Wyoming, I yield to myself 43 minutes, out of which I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] 1 minute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have as late a session as that, 43 minutes yet, we had better have a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope we may receive a conference report in about half an hour. I think we should remain in session until we receive that conference report, at any rate.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Very well. Then I yield 30 minutes to myself, and out of that yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] 1 minute.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by myself before the Young Men's Christian Association at Lancaster, Pa., December 11, 1921, on the problems before the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks leave to extend his remarks by inserting an address on the problems now before the country. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How many problems does it deal with?

Mr. FESS. Quite a number.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very numerous?

Mr. FESS. Quite a number.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So that it will take up many pages of the RECORD?

Mr. FESS. Not many.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It will be interesting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Russian relief bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Russian relief bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Out of my 30 minutes I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for two minutes in order to read a short statement which appears in one of the papers to-day. It is as follows:

Youngstown's brightest gold-star mother will come to Washington Thursday to attend the burial in Arlington National Cemetery of the two sons she gave to her country in the World War.

She is Mrs. John Erickson, 27 Judson, Youngstown, and will be accompanied by her daughter, Miss Ethel Erickson.

When the United States entered the war the two Erickson boys, Carl and Gustave, were among the first to enlist.

The mother gave them gladly to the great cause, although they were all the boys she had, and to give them up meant nights of tearless agony and mighty tugging at her heartstrings.

Both went overseas to France with their mother's hopes and prayers, but neither came back alive. Carl was killed in action. Gustave, a motor cycle courier, escaped the terrible hazards of carrying messages to the front only to become the victim of a fatal accident.

Now their bodies, after three years in a French cemetery, have been shipped back in leaden caskets, and at 2.30 p. m. Thursday will be interred in Arlington along with those of 60 or more other heroes.

It was my good fortune to know these boys. They were next-door neighbors of mine, fine specimens of manhood, who gave their lives, as thousands of other boys did, in defense of their country.

This morning, as I met that mother at the Union Station, I looked into her eyes, realizing the sorrow and suffering she was passing through, I was moved to offer up a silent prayer to Almighty God requesting His help and assistance that something might be done which would inspire the hearts and minds of the great men who are now met in Washington at the Conference for the Limitation of Armament, in a way that there will come out of the conference an agreement among the nations of the earth which will make impossible in the future to come such inhuman wars as destroyed the lives of these young men. [Applause.]

THE PROHIBITION AMENDMENT AND LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, the history of the prohibition law in the United States offers a most remarkable paradox. In this law we have a reform which has beyond doubt enormously decreased the consumption of liquor, decreased the prevalence of those crimes which are traceable to the use of liquor, decreased poverty and financial distress, improved child welfare, greatly benefited business, and added to the health, wealth, and happiness of the people.

The prohibition law was not the result of precipitate action, but was the product of more than 100 years of agitation. Before the Federal law was enacted 32 of the 48 States had passed prohibition laws of their own.

It is generally conceded by thoughtful students of the subject that the eighteenth amendment and the national prohibition act to enforce that amendment are based on two fundamental principles of Government.

The first principle is that a legally constituted majority of the people have an inherent right to better their conditions in the form and manner prescribed by law. The right to protect oneself from harm or danger was the right of the individual before we had society. Judge McLean, of the Supreme Court, expressed this fundamental law as follows:

> It is a power essential to self-preservation and exists in every organized community. It is, indeed, the law of nature and is possessed by man in his individual capacity.

Courts have uniformly recognized the right of the Nation to protect the public health, morals, and safety. Indeed, the inherent right of the people under our Constitution to advance its moral and physical well-being and safety is fundamental. That right has never been denied.

The second fundamental principle follows logically from the first, namely, that any well-recognized evil like the liquor traffic, which menaces the health, morals, and safety of the people, has no right to exist. The United States Supreme Court delivered itself in no uncertain manner concerning the liquor traffic when it stated:

> Statistics of every State show a greater amount of misery and crime attributed to these retail liquor shops than to any other source.

And then concluded its memorable decision by saying:

> There is no inherent right of a citizen of a State or United States to sell intoxicating liquor.

It was therefore legally established by the United States Supreme Court that the beverage liquor traffic was a prolific source of crime and misery and a danger to the welfare and safety of society even before the eighteenth amendment was written into our Constitution, and it can not now be successfully contradicted that the people of the United States were well within their legal rights and acted absolutely on good reasoning, backed by the deliverance of the United States Supreme Court just cited, when they proceeded by the constitutional method to prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of liquor for beverage purposes.

The attempt to create prejudice against the prohibition law by saying the people were never allowed to vote upon it is very misleading. The constitutional amendment was submitted and adopted according to the prescribed method under the form of government of the United States. Prohibition had been a major issue in nearly every congressional and legislative election for years before its adoption, and the Congressmen who voted to submit it and the legislators who voted to ratify it had, in all cases, been elected with a distinct mandate from their constituents on the prohibition issue.

The vote in favor of submitting the national prohibition amendment was, in the House of Representatives, 281 for and 128 against. And in the United States Senate it was 65 for and 20 against. In the State legislatures the total vote of the State senates was 1,288 for ratification and 213 against, or 86 per cent dry. And the total vote in the houses of the State legislatures was 3,739 for ratification and 934 against, or 80 per cent dry; 45 of the 48 State legislatures voted to ratify, although only 36 legislatures were required for ratification.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that was the largest number of States that ever ratified a constitutional amendment, and the largest proportion of States that ever ratified an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yet this law, one of the most beneficial of all our laws, is being subjected to betrayal and attack at the hands of men who are evidently animated by both strong motives and intense emotions.

AN INSIDIOUS PROPAGANDA.

An insidious propaganda, backed without question by the liquor interests of the country, is at the present time being carried on through the press, through magazine articles, through movie films, and through other available propaganda agencies, in order to break down public opinion in support of the prohibition amendment. Statements that are not true are given the widest circulation possible in order that the law and its enforcement may be discredited and public opinion in its support broken down. It can not be claimed that the enforcement of the prohibition law has been perfect, and its enforcement has been gravely affected in many parts of the country by the character of the population and local government and by the deliberate intention on the part of a large number of men and women to break down all sentiment favorable to its enforcement.

As an example of this unjust and lawless propaganda we find metropolitan papers carried recently the headlines that Chief Justice Taft in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, having under consideration a bill for additional Federal judges, is alleged to have said that the major portion of the congested court calendars was due to the enforcement of the Volstead Act and the prohibition amendment, while, as a matter of fact, in the hearings before that committee Chief Justice Taft said that the Volstead Act, in his opinion, had only added about 8 per cent to the total business of the courts, for on page 13 of the hearings we find the following:

> Senator BRANDEGEE. You say, Mr. Justice, that these liquor violation cases amount to about 8 per cent of the total cases?
> Chief Justice TAFT. Yes.

Another case of this insidious propaganda is the statement that the United States Attorney General had indicated in the hearings before the committee that the congestion of the Federal court calendars would continue to increase indefinitely and would ultimately break down all judicial restrictions, and yet, on page 21 of the hearings we find that in direct reply to Senator STERLING to the question—

> Mr. Attorney General, do you not think that there will be an increase of business arising from the enforcement of the prohibition law, for a time, yet?

Attorney General Daugherty said:

> I do not think there will be an increase. I may be mistaken about it, Senator, but my judgment is that it is at its peak, and it wants the exhibition of determination on the part of people who believe that laws ought to be enforced, to start it down from the peak.
> The prohibition law increases this business not to the percentage that the general public is led to believe or that an effort is made to lead the general public to believe that it has increased. You must understand that there are these new tax laws and other laws. There are seven or eight thousand cases in New York growing out of the selective draft, and other things make this necessary, as well as prohibition. That is a contributing part.

Nevertheless, the prohibition law has produced and is producing enormous benefits. Even where worst enforced it is proving much to be preferred to the old system of license under which not only was the appetite of the people served but tempted by every device of advertising, display, and trade promotion.

TELLING TESTIMONY.

Commander Evangeline Booth of the Salvation Army, an organization that probably gets closer to the poor and the down and outs of the country than any other organization in our land, and therefore knows the effect of the liquor traffic as well as any organization can possibly know it, makes the most telling statement concerning the wonderful benefits of prohibition since the enactment of the eighteenth amendment. She says that the population in penal institutions is reduced; that many jails are converted into dwelling apartments, and prisons turned into schools and social centers. She states that prohibition has improved health and reduced mortality in the country. In the city of Boston during the year deaths by accident dropped one-third, deaths from suicide one-fifth, and deaths from alcoholism 79 per cent. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. reports about the same percentage of decrease in fatalities among those previously addicted to drink.

She says that the homes in the slums are immensely improved, and in place of the bread lines the men now support their families and increase their bank accounts. The one outstanding and commanding result of the prohibition amendment, according to Commander Booth, is the increase of the privileges and opportunities of life for the boys and girls of the poorer classes of our country. Indeed, as Evangeline Booth so beautifully puts it:

> It means that in the future we shall have less to do with the grave and more to do with the cradle; less binding up of life's broken plants and more training of life's untrammeled vines; that more of our energy, our ingenious methods, will be thrown into the work of prevention, which in the final analysis must be so much more valuable to the home, the Nation, and the kingdom of God than even the most worthy work of cure.

That is rare testimony from so authentic a source, and one that should set every good and patriotic citizen of our land to thinking and to unite in a vigorous and ceaseless campaign for law enforcement not only of the prohibition amendment, which is now a part of the Constitution, placed there by the sovereign will of a free people, but of every other law of our beloved country. The winking at the infraction of our prohibition law by high and low, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, and too often by men and women of high vantage ground in political and social life, is to-day becoming a real menace to the foundation of our Government and of the life, security, perpetuity, and happiness of our Nation. The violation of the prohibition law, as well as of all other laws, must and will cease at the command of an awakened and aroused conscience of a united citizenship standing for justice, law, and order. [Applause.]

PROHIBITION PROHIBITS.

For the year ended June 30, 1916, the American people consumed the enormous quantity of 2,005,802,325 gallons of alcoholic liquors at an approximate cost to the consumer of $2,438,037,985. For the year ended June 30, 1920, there was withdrawn for consumption, presumably for nonbeverage use, 28,220,909 gallons. In September of this year, 1921, there was a reduction of more than 8,000 withdrawal permits.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I sympathize with the gentleman's purpose, and I want to aid him in what he is saying. There is not now being consumed in this country 5 per cent of the alcohol liquors that were consumed prior to the passage of the prohibition amendment. Except for this law, in this period of reconstruction which we are going through, this country might be in a very bad fix, but by virtue of the adoption of the constitutional amendment we are free from the enormous expense that attends the consumption of liquor in the country, and as a result the people have enough to live on notwithstanding the hard times. [Applause.]

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I thank the gentleman.

These figures can mean only one thing—that the consumption of alcoholic liquors in the United States has been tremendously decreased by prohibition.

Home brewing of liquors and the manufacture of moonshine whisky, while troublesome in certain communities, has been almost a negligible factor when the amount of this illicit manufacture is considered.

Mr. Henry A. Larson, the man most experienced in enforcing prohibition laws in the United States, says that there is not a home-brew manufacturing outfit in more than 1 out of each 1,000 families in the country. Only a comparatively few families in America know how to make palatable beer, and the moonshine whisky produced is so pungent in its odor and vile in its taste that few can consume it.

The decrease in the consumption of liquor is clearly indicated by the enormous increase in the price. The vilest concoctions of wood alcohol and other poisons sell at from $12 to $20 a quart, whereas in the old days of license whisky could be bought for $1 a quart.

COMPENSATION OF SOLDIERS AND THE BEER TAX.

Mr. Chairman, the press recently announced that an effort would be made to provide for a bonus for soldiers from the funds raised from a tax on beer. It has been estimated that $500,000,000 might be secured in this way the first year, and possibly $1,000,000,000 the second year. I do not believe that the ex-service men will look with favor on any plan to raise revenue on an outlawed traffic in order to meet their just demands for adjusted compensation. [Applause.] The declaration of principles of the American Legion is as follows:

For God and country we associate ourselves together for the following purposes: To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a 100 per cent Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our associates in the Great War; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by a devotion of mutual helpfulness.

The Constitution of the United States prohibits the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The kind of beer that is proposed to be legalized is intoxicating liquor, and it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. There would be no chance to raise a large amount of revenue from beer unless there was a real kick in it. The friends of prohibition enforcement are fully apprised of the whole plan, and they will present a united front against this scheme for nullifying prohibition. The so-called "near" beer and light wine amendment has been defeated in every State which has a workable enforcement code. It has been defeated in Congress every time it has come up. Every State which has taken a referendum vote on it has defeated it by a larger majority than when it first adopted prohibition. Even if the Federal law attempted to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and wine, approximately 40 State prohibition laws would prevent its sale. The courts have sustained the definition of intoxicating liquor in the Volstead Act, because experience in the States has proven that it was necessary in order to have effective law enforcement. [Applause.]

To try to load the odium of this nullification scheme into a plan for raising money for adjusted compensation of the soldiers would be futile. There are plenty of sources of revenue open for actual needs without trying to legalize what the Constitution prohibits. I was glad to note the resentment which this suggestion caused among ex-service men when it was made. The people of this country will treat the soldier squarely and provide a compensation which will in a small measure express their appreciation of the heroic sacrifices which the soldiers made for their country. I sincerely hope, however, that the money to do this will not be tainted by coming from an illegal traffic or any scheme to defeat the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment or the national prohibition act. [Applause.] To attempt to tie the veterans of our country's battles to the dead body of the liquor traffic is an outrage. No soldier wants money coined from blood and tears. [Applause.] Beer was responsible for most of the drunkenness in the United States and for still more of the chronic alcoholism, upon which was wasted vast sums, which, since prohibition, have been going into the channels of legitimate trade. But, worst of all, the return of beer would mean the return of the beer saloon, and the men who fought for freedom from autocracy will never countenance the return of that discredited institution. [Applause.]

TESTIMONY OF HIGH AUTHORITIES.

Hon. William Jennings Bryan, one of the greatest advocates for temperance in America and one of the keenest observers of the enforcement of the prohibition laws, recently made the following statement concerning the enforcement of prohibition laws:

They say as much liquor is sold as ever, but the statistics show a tremendous decrease, and this decrease is apparent to any who want to see it. They used to bring liquor in by the carload, deliver it in drays at the principal corners, and bottles were arranged on shelves to lure men to drink. No carload lots are now shipped, they do not deliver it by the dray load at the street-corner saloon, nor is it sold on the principal streets nor exhibited on the shelves. It is brought largely in valises and carried at night through the alleys. This is progress toward the elimination of the evil.

Complaint is made because there are still violations of the law. The law against murder has been on the statute books for over a hundred years, and still some murders are committed and not all murderers are caught. The same is true as to the law against stealing. Last year about 2,500 automobiles were stolen in Philadelphia, and 20 per cent of them were never found. Yet no one suggests the repealing of the law against the stealing of automobiles.

This is the greatest moral reform ever attempted by law. Its success is wonderful. The change already wrought is not only very great but it enables us to understand the benefits that will come to the country when enforcement is perfected. The chief cause of nonenforcement is the appointment of wet officials to enforce a dry law and the smuggling of liquors into our country from the outside. This will be corrected, first, by the appointment of officials to enforce the law who are in sympathy with the law and its enforcement; and, second, by serving notice on our neighboring countries that their flags are being used to protect smugglers.

President D. M. Hainisch, of the Republic of Austria, in a signed message, said:

My message to America is this: Stand by prohibition, enforce the law, because in proportion as you enforce it, there will be a decrease in criminality, pauperism, insanity, and the other things that make for ill in human society.

I regard the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution of the United States of America as one of the greatest and most far-reaching pieces of legislation ever enacted by any nation of the civilized world.

Having been taught by a good mother from my earliest youth to abstain from intoxicants of all kinds and from tobacco, a rule of life which I have followed to this day, I have ever been the unrelenting foe of alcohol in all its forms as a beverage, and trust that at no distant day Austria will follow the United States in the unloading of an incubus so destructive of human life and property.

PRESIDENT HARDING'S VIEWS.

In every community men and women have had an opportunity now to know what prohibition means. They know that debts are more promptly paid, that men take home the wages that once were wasted in saloons, that families are better clothed and fed, and more money finds its way into the savings banks. The liquor traffic was destructive of much that was most precious in American life. In the face of so much evidence on that point what conscientious man would want to let his own selfish desires influence him to vote to bring it back? In another generation I believe that liquor will have disappeared not merely from our politics but from our memories.

Mr. Chairman, the foregoing tribute to prohibition was attributed to President Harding, and his secretary, George B. Christian, jr., writes that the expression is a very fair representation of the President's views on the subject. [Applause.]

WHAT PROHIBITION HAS DONE IN THREE WET CITIES.

The two greatest whisky-producing cities in the United States before prohibition were Louisville, Ky., and Peoria, Ill., and one of the greatest consuming cities was Cincinnati, Ohio. An investigation of the effects of prohibition in those cities is, consequently, of the greatest value.

Louisville, Ky., was headquarters for so-called "fine" whisky. In Peoria most of the cheap whiskies were made. The grip of the whisky industry upon these cities was undeniable. The whisky influence permeated the industrial and financial institutions and was very strong in all civic affairs. In Louisville, where the distillers were mostly men of native American birth and some of them of long American lineage, the industry also had a social influence.

During the fiscal year from June 30, 1918, to June 30, 1919 [wet], the police of Louisville arrested 3,624 people on the charge of drunkenness. In the next succeeding year [dry] only 412 were arrested on the same charge. Arrests for disorderly conduct fell from 5,177 to 2,855.

The Kentuckians have the reputation of being a little quick on the trigger and hot in the head. Nevertheless, when a large majority of them quit drinking booze, the arrests in Louisville on the charge of assault and battery fell from 55 in the last wet year to 38 in the first dry year; with only 88 arrests for carrying concealed weapons when the city was dry as compared with 228 such arrests when the city was wet. Perhaps as a direct result the charges of murder declined from 32 to 21, of malicious assault from 350 to 222, of rape from 11 to 9.

Also, the Louisville people suddenly became very much more honest. In the last wet year 256 of them were arrested on the charge of robbery and in the first dry year only 72; 496 were pulled in out of the wet on charges of grand larceny as compared with only 328 the next year; and the charges of petit larceny declined from 355 in the last wet year to 192 in the first dry year.

A somewhat pathetic tinge is given to these remarkable statistics by the fact that the charges of cruelty and neglect of children declined from 43 to 21.

These figures were not taken from the newspapers or taken from somebody's say so. The signed statement of Mr. Ludlow F. Petty, the chief of police of the city of Louisville, is on file to substantiate them.

Argument against prohibition, it will be noticed, is almost always wet with generalities. It is asserted by the few who oppose prohibition that "more liquor is being consumed now than ever before"; that "this here crime wave, don't you know, is just because of prohibition, nothing else"; that "bootleggers are thicker than insects on a hound dog," and so forth. If, however, such fake generalities are dismissed as unworthy of consideration and the speaker is pinned down to actual facts, the matter changes its aspect considerably. These facts as to Louisville crime are submitted with the belief that they alone establish the success of prohibition in that city, even if not one other fact to the advantage of prohibition could be brought forward. Notice that they are facts. They are not general statements of opinions. They can not be ignored. They must be accounted for in some way.

No wonder that the keeper of the jail in Louisville advertised in the papers:

If you want a room for the Kentucky derby, stop at the jail.

The number of prisoners had been cut down by prohibition so that the jail no longer paid its running expenses, and as rooms were scarce in Louisville, Jailer Barr saw a way to pick up a few honest pennies for the county. He quoted a rate of $1 a day and the guests were assured of "ample protection."

But these police figures are not the only facts that can be brought forward to the advantage of prohibition in Louisville. The mayor of Louisville was asked his candid opinion as to the effect of the closing of saloons, and he replied as follows:

I have received your communication of April 12, 1921. Police records in Louisville show the following facts:

"War-time prohibition went into effect July 1, 1919. From July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, when there was no prohibition in Louisville, the total number of arrests for drunks and drunk and disorderly conduct were 6,809. From July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, inclusive, covered by war-time prohibition and national prohibition, the total number of drunks and cases of drunk and disorderly conduct was 1,061. In other words, during prohibition liquor offenses fell off 84.5 per cent in one year."

Another comparison is as follows:

"From July 1, 1919, to January 15, 1920, which was war-time prohibition, the total number of liquor offenses amounted to 734. On July 1, 1920, the State-wide prohibition law of Kentucky went into effect. From that date, to wit, July 1, 1920, to January 15, 1921, inclusive, the total number of offenses was 791, a slight increase over war-time prohibition, or approximately 84.5 per cent decrease over the same period of time when there was no kind of prohibition.

"This slight reaction is negligible, but is probably accounted for through the fading of the glamor of war patriotism, partly because the population had increased, and largely because through trickery, fraud, and theft much unlawful liquor had been filched from Government warehouses.

"As an economic measure, there can be no question of the beneficial results. I am not a prohibitionist.

"Yours, truly,

"GEO. WEISSINGER SMITH, Mayor."

A friend was in Louisville recently and asked an acquaintance, "What do the business men of this town think of prohibition?" He replied, "At least nine out of ten of them are for it. It has not stopped the sale of liquor. If a man tries hard enough and is willing to spend enough money, he can get what may perhaps be whisky, but the fact remains that very few people in this city are doing it, and the incidental effects of prohibition, such as its reduction of crime and poverty, its favorable effect upon the purchasing power of the average man, and its tremendous influence in steadying the general business situation are too obvious to be ignored by intelligent business men. They would not under any circumstances think of giving up the advantages of prohibition now that they have seen what it means."

"Does this apply to business men who opposed prohibition before it came," he was asked.

"Absolutely," he replied. "Nearly all of the men who opposed it, honestly believing it would be a shock to our banks and would paralyze general business in this city because of the strength of the whisky industry here, now see that they formed their opinions without sufficient study of the matter. Practically every opponent has been won over."

"I am glad to hear that," was the reply. "But I know that you are a prohibitionist. Unconsciously you may have allowed yourself to be influenced by your own particular prejudices in the matter. Can you tell me of some prominent business man who you think would probably have opposed prohibition in the first place, but who is a man of open mind and honest convictions, and would give his real opinion after experience with the law? If such a man were in the banking, wholesale grocery, or real estate business, his opinion would be of practical value."

"Yes," said the citizen of Louisville, "I can name such a man. Mr. James L. Brown, of the James L. Brown Co., real estate brokers, was, I understand, opposed to prohibition before it came, but I was talking to him the other day and he made some remarkable statements. Suppose you approach him for his present opinion."

He was approached, with the result that the following truly astonishing statement was obtained:

It is with pleasure that I give you some facts in regard to what has happened in our city of Louisville since prohibition has been in force.

I am satisfied these facts will greatly encourage you in your good work.

In the first place, all of our low-dive saloons and rum joints are closed up, and are a thing of the past. The proprietors of these dives have moved away or died; anyway, their faces are seen no more. We have soft-drink places that were formerly respectable saloons that are bootlegging and selling whisky at from 50 cents to $1 per drink. They seem to have plenty of moonshine; but the men are afraid to go up against that white-looking whisky, because it will either make them crazy or make them blind. It is a combination of something that is certainly deadly to man.

The property that was formerly occupied by these saloons is now grocery stores, dry goods stores, shoe shops, etc. There is not a vacant corner in Louisville to-day. When a soft-drink shop drops out of business to-day, the property is soon rented, and this is happening right along. There is always some kind of a business ready to start. In fact, I myself am surprised at such a complete change. We formerly had some of the most notorious rum shops in the country, and I have been to quite a number of our large cities and have seen some pretty low dives, and Louisville certainly had its share of such places as well as the rest of the large cities.

The workingman, the mechanic, instead of spending his money for whisky is living as he never lived before. His children have shoes on their feet, clothes on their backs, and food in their homes. Before prohibition went into effect our different charity organizations were taxed to their limit. They were clothing the children as well as feeding them. The workingman is saving his money, he is putting it in savings banks, and looking forward to the day when he can buy a little home. The men tell me that they do not want to see whisky any more, they do not want it back; they are enjoying their little homes and their families and are living as they never lived before.

I know men, and meet them on the street, who a few years ago were absolutely worse than worthless. These men spent practically half of their time in the workhouse or around barrooms. Now, since prohibition, these same men are working every day, providing for their families, and having changed so physically, mentally, and morally, since they have left whisky alone that I can hardly recognize them now. The improvement has been 100 per cent.

In regard to the collection of rents and the effect on installment collections, I wish to state that they are paying up promptly, meeting all obligations, taking a pride in their homes. It is hard to believe that such conditions for the better could take place in such a short time. Our building and loan associations have all they can do to take care of the workingman who is buying his home. I have sold quite a number of homes to men who have saved from $800 to $1,000 in the short time that prohibition has been in force, and while these men have saved this money their families have had the necessities and comforts of life. In closing up real estate transactions these men tell me that the money they are buying their homes with is whisky money that they have saved instead of throwing away.

I am giving you these facts and they are facts from one who has had over 30 years of experience in collecting rents, renting houses, and selling houses on the installment plan, from one who has seen these conditions change, from one who has been in these homes. As the old saying is, "Whisky, filth, and misery are partners."

Louisville to-day is a paradise compared to what it was before prohibition went into effect.

There are practically no empty houses in Louisville to-day; there is work for everybody who will go out and get it; prohibition is working wonders. Men are paying their bills, paying their rent, and are looking out for a rainy day.

I used to spend half of my time in the magistrate courts garnisheeing these men for not paying their rent. I have not garnisheed a man for over 14 months. It is hard to realize the improvement that has taken place. The people who had dirty homes are now living in clean homes and are comfortable. Instead of their money going for whisky it is going for food and clothing and the necessities of life.

I could write you a dozen pages and tell you the different circumstances and conditions of the people, such great changes have taken place. Our workhouses and jails are practically empty.

I am giving you these facts as I know them and, as I said before, from my own observation.

Wishing you success, I am,

Respectfully, JAMES L. BROWN.

The city of Louisville is the connecting link between Kentucky and Indiana and its people have many of the virtues of both States. Socially, it is southern; industrially, it is middle western. Main Street in Louisville, before constitutional prohibition, might better have been named "Whisky Street." It was the distributing center of world-famous distilleries. Many of these distillers were substantial, patriotic citizens, not conscious of any moral guilt. One of them was known as quite an authority on the Bible. Many of them were directors of financial institutions and leaders in community affairs. They dominated the financial, industrial, and social life of the city.

Fourth Avenue is the promenade street of the city. On this street are the principal shops and close to it are the leading theaters and hotels. On Saturday night it is thronged with the usual crowd of young people out to see and be seen. Bisecting Fourth Avenue is Green Street. In the old days within two blocks of Fourth Avenue there were on Green Street solid blocks of filthy houses of ill-fame which were an indescribable curse to the city. Just six blocks from Fourth Avenue, at Tenth and Green Streets, was the center of the Negro slums, with crap dens and disreputable houses and saloons at every turn. On Saturday and Sunday nights this place was a bedlam, with whisky and blood flowing freely. The newspapers reported that during one period of 24 hours, over Saturday and Sunday nights, there were more than 100 arrests within one block of Tenth and Green Streets on charges ranging from serious cutting to murder. This district "slopped over" on better streets, and the slum denizens, protected by the city government, became annoyingly bold.

To-day the city is so thoroughly changed that it bears no more similarity to the old city of Louisville than heaven bears to hell. Green Street has been redeemed. The houses that were formerly used for disreputable purposes are now occupied by perfectly respectable colored people; the saloons are closed; the crap dens are closed; the students from the military schools that come to the city on Saturdays are no longer sources of keen anxiety to parents and instructors, and the business life of the town is utterly changed. The banks have been freed from distillery influence and are able to encourage other enterprises, with a result that the city is more prosperous than it had ever been before and growing steadily and surely into a city which will be a mighty influence for righteousness in the very heart of America's life. So much for Louisville.

THE WORLD'S BANNER WHISKY CITY.

Now, let us step a little farther north to Peoria, Ill. Peoria was the greatest whisky city in the world before Uncle Sam reformed. It was to the cheap whisky trade what Louisville was to the fine whisky trade. Located in the center of the corn belt, its immense distilleries had a capacity for grinding approximately 42,000 bushels of grain a day. Much is said of the illicit manufacture of whisky in the United States, but there will be few to dispute the statement that not all of the illicit stills in the United States grind 42,000 bushels of grain in a year, not to mention a day. Peoria's immense whisky trade formerly gripped the imaginations of the surrounding territory. Many of the farmers believed that this market for their grain was absolutely required. The business men of Peoria were horrified at the mere suggestion that prohibition might some day be the law of the land. They were unable to see how the city could survive such a shock to its principal industry.

After prohibition, however, the Chicago Tribune headed a story as to prohibition in Peoria as follows: "Bacchus is dead! Long live Midas!" As soon as prohibition stopped the distilling of whisky, Peoria immediately stepped into a prosperity of which it had never before dreamed. We have the word of the Peoria Clearing House Association that bank clearings for the year 1918 were $249,507,480.74; for the year 1919, $260,439,834.78; and for the year 1920, $281,528,228.93.

Mr. Willis Evans, executive secretary of the Peoria Association of Commerce, addressed a letter to Mr. Dan R. Sheen, of Peoria, which brings out not only in an authoritative but in a striking way the value of prohibition to that town:

I know that you rejoice with us that the Peoria distilleries, 13 in number, located in Peoria and Pekin, are now used for other purposes than the grinding of corn for alcohol or whisky and similar beverages, which you fought to the death for so many years, and finally saw the crowning of your fight in the eighteenth amendment.

Some of your friends may inquire some day what these distilleries are now used for. One of the big Pekin distilleries is now the big Liberty Yeast Factory, the other distillery at Pekin is used for the manufacture of food products.

In Peoria the distilleries were taken over by the United States Food Products Co., and they spent about $5,000,000 in rejuvenating the plants and now produce all kinds of food for man and beast. This includes sugar and corn sirup and corn oils, preserves of all kinds, yeast, white vinegar, wheat flour, etc. When the distilleries were taken over and these notable improvements made, it was announced that they had $30,000,000 to spend and would continue until the plants were in the finest condition. Recently the United States Food Products Co. has suffered a relapse, perhaps due to the general industrial condition, and they are now operating at the minimum.

The breweries—three in number—are utilized for general manufacturing. For example, the Leisy Brewing Co. is now a malt extracting plant and an ice factory. The Gipps Brewing plant makes sirups for soda fountains, yeast, and other food products. The Union Brewing Co. is occupied by the Automatic Carbonic Machine Co., which manufactures ice plants for homes and hotels. Other buildings formerly occupied by the Union Brewing Co. are used for similar purposes.

It is also notable that Peoria has not suffered since this marvelous change in industry. The concerns occupying the old distilling and brewing plants employ more men and more money is involved than in the old days. Our bank clearings have increased at the rate of $15,000,000 each year since that July 1 enactment.

All of the saloon property in Peoria is used for drink parlors, residences, offices, etc.

Oftentimes we receive letters from those who think that Peoria received an awful jolt and that our business is stagnant. The opposite is true. I don't think there is an empty building in Peoria, and we need 500 to 1,000 residences.

I am glad to send these facts to you, and they are just as I have found them.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIS EVANS,
Executive Secretary Peoria Association of Commerce.

Mr. Chairman, it is hard to get around such a letter as this, is it not?

Here we have conclusive testimony that prohibition has resulted in more business and better business, more employees, and better use of capital. If any city in the country could have been "ruined" by prohibition, Peoria would have been that city, and yet we find that, so far from ruining Peoria, it has proven an inestimable blessing. Morally and financially the town is better off. We have not only the word of Mr. Evans to this effect, but the word of scores of Peoria business men, who testify in detail to these same facts. Real estate men explain that rent collections are very much better, that installment payments are very much more easily collected, and that property is in greater demand. Dealers in merchandise, player pianos, phonographs, and similar goods find the credit of the poorer class of people very much better, and their volume of business is largely increased. Employers of labor testify to more regular appearance on Mondays and after holidays, to more efficient and contented workmen, and to a better home life as a basis for the prosperity and contentment of their labor. Laundries report hundreds of poor women freed from the washtubs, and dairies report thousands of poor children now properly fed with life-giving milk who formerly got the scraps and leavings from the father's pay envelope.

CRIME IN PEORIA.

Peoria records the usual result upon crime statistics. The following letter from the superintendent of police of Peoria is authoritative and illuminating:

Replying to your inquiry of the 2d instant relative to records of arrests preceding prohibition and year thereafter, I herewith submit the following record of this department:

Total arrests for drunkenness July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1919, 1,780.
Total arrests for drunkenness July 1, 1919, to July 1, 1920, 295.
Total arrests for all causes July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1919, 5,966.
Total arrests for all causes July 1, 1919, to July 1, 1920, 2,937.

Very respectfully,

W. W. RHODES, Superintendent.

Mr. Chairman, there is no pretense that prohibition has settled all of life's problems in Louisville and Peoria. It is perfectly true that some of the people are making "home brew." It is also perfectly true that no family continues to make this "home brew" very long. It is usually attempted as a lark, and if it is consumed for some days the consumer usually has to go in for quite a course of eliminating medicine. The stuff plays hob with the liver, and in due time replaces the alcohol appetite of the consumer with a shuddering distaste for anything that even smells like beer. It is also probably true that a few, a very few, people have tried to make whisky. The result of these efforts is a pungent, explosive liquid, even the odor of which is so disgusting that an open bottle drives an average person out of the room. As a beverage it is just about as palatable and practicable as spirits of ammonia. When a man takes one sample swallow of it he usually concludes that that will just about do him for the remainder of his life. Only a person with an ulcerated stomach and an entire lack of respect for his interior fools with "moonshine" very long.

The greatest asset which has come to Peoria and Louisville because of prohibition has been the fact that the young people are not drinking or learning to drink. In the old days they would start to drink on beer and proceed from that to stronger liquors. But in these days they absolutely refuse to try to cultivate a liquor appetite on hair tonic, shoe polish, varnish, moonshine, or home brew. The reward is not worth the trouble. A generation from now Peoria and Louisville will have a population which not only does not know the taste of liquor but is not at all interested in the subject. In that day the people will read in unbelieving wonder of the time when these cities had saloons, bawdyhouses, and crap dens.

CINCINNATI.

When the remainder of the State of Ohio, convinced by its observation of the workings of prohibition elsewhere, wanted to go dry, Cincinnati would step in and veto the proposition with a tremendous local majority sufficient to offset the dry majority elsewhere. Not until the war was fought and won and the boys came home to vote dry was Ohio able to pile up its 290,000 plus majority in support of the dry laws already in operation.

The men who want to make money out of the return of the saloon and the men who want to use it as an instrument to corrupt politics are busy in Cincinnati, as elsewhere, fighting the law and using every influence of suggestion to incite the people to law violation. But these people are not nearly so numerous, nor are they so vociferous in Cincinnati as in New York, Philadelphia, and other eastern cities. The satisfaction of Cincinnati with prohibition is very apparent, and, in spite of the fact that the local newspapers are wet, its benefits are not obscured by a flood of false propaganda and those violations of the law which are the direct result of incitement.

The Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church has a complete police record for a number of years before and after prohibition. The usual startling decrease in all crimes directly, or even remotely, affected by drink consumption is found. The number of arrests for intoxication in 1918 was 1,470 and in 1920, 335.

Cincinnati has felt the so-called "crime wave" as much as any other part of the country, and as a result there is an increase in the number of cases of "assault to murder" from 18 to 26 and of housebreaking from 21 to 31. But, on the contrary, there is a decrease in the number of cases of assault and battery from 772 to 656, of murder from 38 to 7, and of disorderly conduct from 3,320 to 1,727.

It is possible that there has been a tendency toward increase in crime in Cincinnati as all over the world, which has been sharply checked by prohibition. A careful study of the following table showing arrests for 1918 and 1920 is quite worth while:

Abuse to family	276	221
Begging	253	75
Common prostitute	278	283
Disorderly conduct	3,320	1,727
Intoxication (city and State cases)	1,470	335
Loitering	2,244	765
Assault and battery	772	656
Cruelty to animals	32	3
Failing to provide for child	312	165
Failing to provide for parent	17	10
Housebreaking	21	31
Assault to kill	18	26
Assault to rape	4	4
Assault to rob	11	5
Burglary	78	73
Cutting to kill	70	46
Embezzlement	61	47
Grand larceny	176	242
Murder	38	7
Rape	8	14
Robbery	98	107
Total of stated cases	9,457	4,837

These charges include every crime concerning which drink was thought to have any significance. The table clearly indicates that prohibition has caused a vast decrease in minor crimes, a great increase of prosperity and responsibility among the poor, as indicated by the decrease in arrests on charges of failure to provide; fluctuating results in more serious cases with a considerable decrease in the number of arrests on most of the serious charges stated.

The year of 1918 instead of 1919 is compared with 1920 because part of the year 1919 was wet and part dry. In consideration of the table it should also be remembered that in 1919 a large number of men were out of the city while in 1920 the troops had returned from the war and the city's full population entered into the statistics.

During November and December of 1920 fully one-half of all the misdemeanors on the municipal court docket were traffic offenses.

A letter from Judge W. H. Lueders, of the probate court, gives figures for commitments from the city to insane asylums for 1919, which was six months dry, and 1920, which was all dry. These figures are:

There has been, also, a most notable effect on the city's health record. Cirrhosis of the liver, which is almost always the result of alcohol, caused 57 deaths in 1919, which was only half dry, and only 47 in 1920. There were 7 cases of deaths from alcoholism in 1919 and only 4 in 1920. The total of deaths in Cincinnati during 1918 was 730; in 1919, 886; in 1920, 611; and in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, 530. The death rate per annum fell from 20.90 in 1918 to 15.85 in 1921. There has been a notable decrease in deaths of children due to neglect of childish ailments by parents. A sharp decrease in deaths from pneumonia is found and a notable decrease in deaths from tuberculosis.

The decrease in the number of deaths is especially interesting because it is largely found among children from 1 to 10 years of age, and among men from 30 to 60 years and over. Seemingly the statistics have not been greatly influenced by influenza, as this disease almost confined itself to young people from 10 to 30 years of age, and it is in that age group that we find the least decrease in the death rate.

The hospital statistics support the conclusions indicated by the improved death rate. The Christ Hospital says:

> Since the prohibition law has gone into effect we notice a great decrease in the number of patients who come in suffering from after effects of alcoholism.

The effect of prohibition upon business in Cincinnati is similar to its effect in a hundred other cities.

Nineteen hundred and twenty was, as is well known, a period of after-war depression. Nevertheless the State banks of Ohio showed total resources of $1,343,976,585 on June 30, 1920, as compared with $1,161,115,125 on June 30, 1919.

There has been a consequent increase in buying power and industrial efficiency. This is the testimony of practically all Cincinnati business men approached.

Mr. S. A. Fisher, of S. A. Fisher & Sons, puts the matter clearly when he says:

> Working conditions have improved very much in factories generally. There is more prompt appearance and better production.

Men have been buying more and better furniture and indulging in the little luxuries which benefit the entire family. In response to a query, one of the largest furniture houses in the city gave definite figures of their business for the years June, 1919, and June, 1920, as follows: Net business for year ending June 30, 1919, $144,189.46. Total net business for year ending June 30, 1920, $224,836.71. The increase in collections and down payments in the dry year amounted to $70,458.45, or 62 per cent over 1919.

This concern is very enthusiastic over prohibition, points to the empty workhouse, states that injuries due to alcohol have practically disappeared, and that Salvation Army relief to the destitute has been reduced to the smallest volume ever known.

There has been a normal, or better than normal, increase in the business of the dairies, laundries, and motion-picture houses.

Particular inquiry was made as to the effect of prohibition on the real estate business—whether or not the property formerly used for retailing liquors was promptly rented for other purposes and what has been the result on the matter of collecting rents and installment payments on property.

William V. Ebersole & Co. writes that the saloon property in the central district was quickly taken at "largely increased rentals, and collections have been and are good." They continue:

> Practically all saloon properties have been rented for other purposes and usually at an advanced price; collections are much better and forfeitures about one-fifth the number under liquor rule.

Practically every real estate man testifies to the immediate rental of saloon properties.

Mr. Arthur W. Davis says:

> While prohibition closed many places, they were at once reoccupied by restaurants and shops of all kinds at greatly increased rentals. In central Cincinnati there are few or no vacancies in residences, flats, stores, or warehouses. On the outskirts a few saloon properties may be idle, but auto accessory stores and stations have filled many of these.

Warren Richards & Co. write:

Prohibition has had a splendid effect.

Bofinger & Hopkins say:

Properties formerly rented for purposes of retailing liquors are now renting for figures 25 to 50 per cent higher.

Mr. Nathaniel H. Maxwell writes:

Every director and stockholder in this company are unanimous in thinking prohibition the greatest benefit that has ever come to this or any other country, and they would consider a return to former days an unparalleled calamity.

Even the churches have benefited. Rev. John F. Knapp, of McKendree Methodist Episcopal Church, says:

I am the pastor of a church in the poorer section of the city, coming to its pulpit just before prohibition went into effect. The year previous to my coming the church had only paid for all purposes about $1,500. Last year we raised in the neighborhood of $4,500. The attendance at the Sunday school is more than doubled and the number of contributing members has more than doubled. I am inclined to place a considerable amount of the credit for this good result to prohibition.

Rev. Robert Kennedy says:

I just received 20 men into the church last Sunday, and I am quite confident they would not have taken that stand if the saloons had still been with us.

There is violation of the law in Cincinnati, of course. But the mayor and chief of police seem to be disposed to suppress the traffic, and Federal enforcement has been fairly good, though somewhat spotted. The moonshiners and bootleggers are practically all foreigners, and when prohibition first went into effect they passed stills around among themselves as in the old days washing machines were passed around for use on certain days in the week. But one by one, like the leaves, the moonshiners have fallen by the wayside, and to-day moonshining is generally recognized as a very hazardous business.

The large fine workhouse is closed, its cells are empty, and it stands a monument to prohibition.

The former "Mecca" saloon, known as the "finest west of New York City," is now occupied by the American Legion boys.

The former Palace Hotel bar is now a "palace of sweets."

The saloon of Joseph D. Hamilton, which formerly did a low-class business, is now selling shoes.

Chop suey and clothes are being retailed at the location of Schule's café and billiard hall.

The saloon of William I. Eimer is now dealing in magazines and cigars.

The saloon at Canal and Main Streets, formerly run by Giacomo Sturla, now has its shop windows filled with ladies' wearing apparel.

The oldest barrel house in Cincinnati, formerly the "Galt House," is now a bakery.

The former wet headquarters of the Brewers' Exchange is now headquarters of the American Red Cross.

A cafeteria has replaced Weber's saloon and a clothing shop the saloon of William G. Brown.

You can buy straw hats and handkerchiefs where Harry Blackman formerly sold booze.

It is only when the man who was familiar with Cincinnati in the old days allows his mind to wander back to the time when all of these places were selling beer and whisky that the present state of affairs makes an impression never to be forgotten.

Mr. Chairman, prohibitionists have often been accused of saying that prohibition would bring in the millennium. Nothing could be further from the truth. They realize that many of our troubles have their root in the weaknesses of human nature, and that there are other evils abroad, some of which are even more serious than the appetite for alcohol. But they have contended that alcohol is in league with every other evil; that it contributes to the death rate by creating soil favorable to tuberculosis, venereal disease, pneumonia, and other sicknesses. They have never thought that prohibition would entirely do away with the danger of business depression or abolish that class of society which is improvident and delinquent.

What they have contended is this: That under prohibition there would be a distinct increase in legitimate business turnover, which would add greatly to the community prosperity and largely mitigate periodic depressions. They have contended that the death rate would be lowered; that the jails, workhouses, and hospitals would be relieved of the necessity of dealing with many men who met their misfortune because of alcohol. They have said that labor would be more efficient, more prosperous, and more happy; that prohibition would year by year add to its own efficiency because of the fact that self-respecting young men would not learn to drink.

These things have been proven true in Cincinnati. The world has witnessed a universal depression of business in the reaction from war conditions. Cincinnati has felt this depression very slightly, whereas in the old days when the saloons were open there would have been the greatest distress, with actual hunger and suffering and restless disaffection among laboring classes. To-day every honest workingman in Cincinnati is getting plenty to eat, not only for himself but for his family. His only complaint to-day is due to the fact that since prohibition his standard of living has risen to the point where he is demanding the luxuries that were common only to the middle-class families five years ago, and he is not always able under present business conditions to keep his family life up to this standard.

In the light of the facts as we have them to-day it is amazing that there was a time when otherwise sensible people actually believed that a dry city meant a dead city; that to banish the saloons would be a serious blow to "business." If the old arguments against the dry law, published widespread during the campaigns, are now gone over one by one, they appear grotesque in their absurdity.

Since the saloons closed, immorality and crime have taken to cover, real estate values have been enhanced, and respectable shops and residences have taken the place of the barrooms. If the public is not buying with the mad extravagance of 1920 it is at least spending its money with a freedom unknown in 1914. Bank deposits have increased, savings accounts are larger, small capitalists are much more numerous, the slums, known formerly as "Over the Rhine," have practically disappeared. That portion of Longworth Street formerly occupied by saloons, brothels, and other deviltry has reformed. The saloons of Vine Street, some of which formerly had red lights in the upper windows, others known to be really gambling dens, are now perfectly respectable places. The gamblers, the shameless women, the derelicts, have gone somewhere—no one knows where.

No use to go "slumming," for there are no slums to find. About the only orgies possible to a slumming party are reckless dissipation in the buying of silk shirts and soda water where formerly the painted women and nose-painted men held forth.

Mr. O. B. Carlisle, of the old City Mission, at 1106 Vine Street, was quoted as saying:

Prohibition has worked a miracle "Over the Rhine"; we have not had a half dozen drunken men come in in four months, while we used to have 25 a night. It was common for 6 or 8 men and women drunk and in their delirium to be on their feet at once trying to testify and promising to lead better lives, but now we have only a small attendance. Prohibition has brought it all about.

The Stanley Mission, the largest in Cincinnati, had a nation-wide fame for its effective work among the people of the underworld. It was conducted by the Stanley brothers for 12 years or more, when it was sadly needed. After a few months of prohibition, Mr. Stanley said:

We have not had a half dozen drunken men in the mission since prohibition cleaned up the city. We used to have 20 or more come in every night. Sometimes six or eight men crazy with drink would come into our mission meetings and become so noisy we would have to put them out. Drunken Negroes and white bums would at times gather around the front doors and threaten to smash the windows and burn the building if we did not get out of the neighborhood.

But prohibition has surely transformed things in this section. Men used to come into the mission who had never had a suit of clothes. They wore blue overalls, but with the saloon gone they have been spending their money for something to wear for themselves and families. Until prohibition came scores of men who hung around the saloons near the mission never owned a white collar or a clean shirt. Now some of them are wearing $15 pairs of shoes. They have gone to work. They have found their self-respect. They know that drinking booze is a habit they can get along without. It is impossible to tell all that prohibition has done for Cincinnati.

The movies have particularly prospered because of the removal of the saloon. Probably in the down-town section 15,000 people can be seated in the principal picture shows, and seats are usually hard to find during the rush hours.

It is of the greatest importance to understand that the popular drink in Cincinnati was beer, not whisky. So nearly universal was its use that on hot summer days it was not at all uncommon to see beer running in thin streams out of the saloon doors, across the sidewalks, and into the gutter. Hundreds, if not thousands, of Cincinnati citizens were accustomed to take their noonday meals in the saloons, with beer to wash it down.

This beer custom showed up strongly in the character of criminals and delinquents with which the city had to deal. The Scientific American well said:

The most dangerous classes of ruffians in our large cities are beer drinkers. Intellectually, a stupor amounting almost to paralysis arrests the reason, changing the higher faculties into a mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish, varied only with paroxysms of anger, senseless, and brutal.

The senseless, brutal, and unprovoked crime, the stupid ill temper which is the product of beer, added greatly to the problems of the Cincinnati police force. Particularly did this deterioration in temperament of a great many of Cincinnati youths cause trouble on the steamers, at the amusement resorts, and on the streets in the twilight.

One baseball "fan" expressed the opinion that prohibition had a great deal to do with the improvement in play of the Cincinnati professional ball team. He said:

The Cincinnati beer drinkers used to go out to the park, and whenever a man made an error, no matter how excusable, they would start in to abuse him at the top of their voices. The result was that no good player wanted to stay in Cincinnati, and while there he was not very enthusiastic about the success of the team with which he was playing.

Cincinnati, therefore, would not be satisfied with any adjustment of the liquor problem that would return the beer saloon. In fact, a great many of the people who were formerly beer drinkers and beer enthusiasts to-day denounce whisky and beer, with their degrading, brutalizing influence on community life.

A Kentuckian residing just across the line from Cincinnati summed up the effect of prohibition upon that city as follows:

1. It has increased bank clearings.
2. It has largely increased bank deposits.
3. Savings accounts have been particularly benefited.
4. Building activity has been limited only by high prices and abnormal conditions.
5. The scarcity of business failures in spite of the reaction of the war is remarkable.
6. Retail business has gained in almost all lines, especially in necessities and small luxuries.
7. Saloon properties have been rented without difficulty.
8. Rent collections among the poor have been very much better.
9. There has been an increase in the family washing business of laundries.
10. There has been an increase in the use of water.
11. Electric light is much more generally used among the poor.
12. Real estate men have waiting lists and there are no vacant houses.
13. Arrests for drunkenness have enormously decreased.
14. The number of murders is lower than for many years.
15. Five thousand saloon bums are either at work or have left the city.
16. Contrary to prophecies the hotels are doing a banner business.

But prohibition has not had a square deal, especially from the newspapers, by which it has been persistently misrepresented.

In spite of that fact at least two-thirds of all the people of Cincinnati are for it.

Prohibition is not ideal in its operation in Cincinnati, but it is on the job and everybody knows it.

"Is there much booze being sold around town?" a barber at the Sinton Hotel was asked. Trust a barber to know.

"You bet there ain't," he replied. "There is mighty little of it around now. It used to be that half the men who came in here smelled like whisky, and on Monday morning the men who had been stewed the night before came around here for face massages to wake them up. Now I don't smell whisky on a man in a month."

Ohio, gradually but slowly convinced of the value of prohibition, in 1920, with the boys home from the war and voting, rolled up a dry majority in support of the law of 290,141. The dry majority in 1919, with the soldiers away, and before the Ohioans had had time to test the law adequately, was only 41,853.

Prohibition in Cincinnati is 50 per cent more efficient than the old system of license and regulation, which was violated far more frequently and more successfully than the prohibition law has been.

THE EFFECT ON PUBLIC HEALTH.

One of the most startling effects of the prohibition law has been the decrease in mortality and the improved public health because of it.

In New York the infant mortality rate in 1915 was 99, and for the years 1916 to 1918 it was 93. The infant mortality rate for 1921 was 85. In 18 months after national prohibition became effective there were 21 weeks with no reported deaths from alcoholism. The total number of such deaths in New York dropped from 680 in 1916 to 69 in 1920, a decrease of nearly 90 per cent. The average number of deaths from cirrhosis of the liver for the seven years, 1912 to 1918, was 722. The average for the two years 1919 and 1920 was 370, a decrease of nearly 49 per cent. Bright's disease and nephritis decreased by 17 per cent.

THERE HAS BEEN NO INCREASE IN DRUG ADDICTION.

A questionnaire recently sent out by the Scientific Temperance Federation to the secretary of the State board of health of each State in the United States and to boards of health of all cities of over 80,000 inhabitants brought overwhelming testimony to the fact that drug addiction is decreasing as alcohol consumption decreases.

NATURE OF THE OPPOSITION TO THE LAW.

There is no disposition to conceal the fact that a great deal of liquor is being smuggled across the border from Canada and Mexico; that rum runners are bringing in a great deal of liquor from the Bahama Islands; that bootlegging constitutes a serious danger to the public welfare; and that people with more money than brains or character are doing their best to bring the law into contempt.

There is no reason for surprise that the enforcement of the law is encountering difficulties when there are 30 paid organizations striving night and day, not only to accomplish the impossible feat of causing the repeal of the eighteenth amendment but to accomplish its nullification, to stabilize a condition of nullification, and cause the American people to surrender to its public enemies and permit a return of beer and whisky and the American beer saloon.

Some judges by the infliction of insufficient sentences or by dismissal of the criminals have stabbed and undermined the law and aided in its nullification. Hundreds of newspapers have forgotten their high standards and have loaned their columns to vicious and misleading propaganda against the law. But most serious of all have been the efforts of those men and organizations who are moved by a political motive. Nothing is more certain than that corrupt politics as such must perish in our great cities unless the beer saloon returns. The saloon was the agency through which these organizations reached their following, and now that the saloon keepers have been scattered abroad corrupt politics is robbed of its greatest instrumentality and medium of approach. In due time the looting and profiteering of our great cities must stop, because the saloon is no longer able to supply the votes.

It should always be remembered that the saloon was a beer saloon as well as a whisky saloon. Ninety-two per cent of all the liquors passing over the bar was beer. The brewers controlled from 75 to 85 per cent of all the saloons, either by ownership or mortgages. If the liquor interests can bring back beer, they can bring back the saloon, and that is all they want, because they know that the return of the saloon means the return of every kind of liquor.

OUR NATIONAL TASK.

Mr. Chairman, our supreme task to-day is to arouse the indifferent and apathetic citizen to a sense of our great national danger of law violations; to bring speedily to the bar of justice the law-breaking brewer, distiller, manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer of liquors; to apprehend and convict the smuggler, the rum runner, the moonshiner, and his numerous confederates; to rebuke by righteous indignation the shameless propaganda for the nullification of our prohibition laws and the undermining of respect for all law. [Applause.]

LAW THE BASIS OF OUR PROSPERITY AND PERPETUITY.

Law, including the prohibition law, is the very basis of the stability and prosperity of our country.

The men who are striking at the prohibition law do not realize that they are striking at their own property interests; that if they should accomplish what they wish and bring the prohibition law crashing to the ground, they would bring down also the fabric of which it is a part. The Constitution would become meaningless. Popular elections, so long held sacred in their results, would become contemptible. The spirit of anarchy would be let loose and no man would know whether or not he might call his property his own, or whether the safety of his wife and children could be assured by the law and the instruments of the law which had been flaunted and condemned.

Prohibition was adopted by the greatest majority any constitutional provision ever received. It was adopted by the method prescribed by the makers of the Constitution. It is an integral part of the Constitution itself. It can be repealed by orderly processes without danger to the Constitution, but it can not be nullified without tearing the very heart out of our system of government.

BURNING WORDS FROM AUTHORITIES.

Attorney General Daugherty on August 31, 1921, speaking in Cincinnati, Ohio, said:

Respect for law is the one essential fact of our civilization. Without it life, liberty, and property are insecure. Without it civilization falls back to chaos. If there is one fact history teaches above any other it is that the rights incident to wealth and the rights furnishing the opportunity to enjoy spiritual, intellectual, moral, and social things are conditioned upon the supremacy of law. The Government will endure on the rock of law enforcement or it will perish in the quicksands of lawlessness.

In similar burning words the American Bar Association, through its judicial section, on the same day made this remarkable statement:

The judicial section of the American Bar Association venturing to speak for all the judges, wishes to express this warning to the American people: Reverence for law and enforcement of law depend mainly upon the ideals and customs of those who occupy the vantage ground of life in business and society. The people of the United States, by solemn constitutional and statutory enactment, have undertaken to suppress the age-long evil of the liquor traffic. When, for the gratification of their appetites, or the promotion of their interests, lawyers, bankers, great merchants and manufacturers, and social leaders, both men and women, disobey and scoff at this law, or any other law, they are aiding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery, and homicide; they are sowing dragon's teeth, and they need not be surprised when they find that no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest.

At the national law enforcement convention held in Washington December 6 to 8 another patriotic appeal for law and order was made by Assistant Attorney General Guy D. Goff, as follows:

We may bite our chains as we will, but we shall be made to know that man is born to be governed by law, and he that will substitute will in the place of it is an enemy of God.

To have good government we must have good citizens, and always, continuously, a warfare without truce or quarter against those who violate the law. It is strange but true that bad men are combined and good citizens are divided and that therein lies the cause of lawbreaking. If the good would join hands, the lawless could do nothing.

We must legislate and prosecute and drastically punish, but principally we must educate, and practice what we preach.

It is not for an executive, State or Federal, to say whether a law is good or bad. He should enforce it, or confess failure and resign.

Prohibition is not the only law which is difficult to enforce.

Any new law which interferes with the so-called personal liberty of the community must pass through the stages of open violation, secret violation, passive enforcement, and then universal observance throughout the land.

The man who can not obey the law, the man who can not fearlessly enforce the law, and with the courage of his convictions bring before our judicial tribunals every dastardly and contemptible crook, no matter how high his rank, has no place in our system.

The law stands, proclaiming, "Thou shalt not break," and when that commandment is broken the Nation should bend its efforts to see that atonement is made. The quickest and surest way of setting any law at naught is to relax its enforcement, while the quickest and surest way of instilling respect for the law in the hearts of a people is to vigorously press its enforcement.

Our Government and our Constitution are not to be overthrown by the whims or the depravity of those who speculate in public justice and view it as an article of personal favor. The parasites that fatten on crime and live on human sin shall not be permitted to traffic in our liberties and, vulturelike, sink their gorging beaks into our laws.

To-day all mankind is suspicious, doing nothing, playing safe. America must not and will not yield to this condition. Instead, she must be the positive Nation. She will. And she will, I am sure, be positively good.

We have no room for those who would have us exchange our liberty and freedom for isms and licentious license. Such people, as the Attorney General well says, "should go to a country which gives them their peculiar liberty."

The law must be, and it should be, enforced as it is conceived and written, and always without fear or favor. And I bring the pledge that in so far as it lies within the power of the Department of Justice to execute and enforce the law of the land there will be no backward step, no retreat, in preserving the Constitution and carrying out the mandate of the people.

THE PROHIBITION AMENDMENT WILL NEVER BE REPEALED.

The eighteenth amendment will never be repealed. That is admitted even by the strongest opponents of the prohibition law. It will always remain a fundamental part of our Constitution. The only issue is, Shall it be enforced or shall it be nullified?

The American people are determined that it shall be enforced. A concerted movement of gigantic proportions, supported by every liquor agency and utilizing all antiprohibition propaganda in our country, is to-day attempting to break down public opinion favorable to prohibition and create a condition of nullification. The agitation for the return of light wines and beer is but another plea for the return of the saloon and the resurrection of King Bacchus from his chilly grave. But the American people will not be deceived. The return of beer and wines means the return of the old saloon. The old American saloon was essentially a beer saloon. We are told that 75 to 85 per cent of the saloons of the Nation were either owned or controlled by the breweries.

The American people and the American Congress will stand by the edict of the majority and meet the issue. Nullification of our laws will never be tolerated, for it would ultimately spell anarchy, tyranny, and chaos. Only selfish greed, corrupt politics, and misguided thought will ever plead for the return of the American saloon or the nullification of our prohibition laws. Our Government will forever endure in the adherence to our Constitution and laws, but will weaken with their disregard and perish with their nullification. [Applause.]

LINCOLN'S MESSAGE.

To-day the spirit of Abraham Lincoln sends this message to the American people:

Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor. Let every man remember that to violate the laws is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in the legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. In short, let it become the political religion of the Nation.

Reverence for law and insistence upon the enforcement of law are the only states of the public mind that will fulfill the promises of the immortal Declaration of Independence and will verify the vision of its immortal founders. These are the ideas, truly American, that to-day must elevate the intellectual spirit of our Nation and ennoble the achievements of our spiritual, moral, social, mental, and economic life. King Alcohol is outlawed by our Constitution. He can never legally come back to our fair land and be protected under our stainless flag. An awakened Christian conscience of mankind will soon banish him from the earth. A saloonless world will some day be an accomplished fact. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BURTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

RUSSIAN RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2, and from the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill.

JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
H. W. TEMPLE,
TOM CONNALLY,
Managers on the part of the House.
REED SMOOT,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, quite a number of Members of the House opposed the bill as it passed the House and voted against it. However, that question was settled at that time. I understand that the conference report preserves the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. ROGERS. There is absolutely no change from it in title or text as it passed the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I personally do not see what good or advantage might accrue by insisting upon further opposition. I make no objection to the present consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the adjournment resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming calls up a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the two Houses complete the business of the calendar day of Thursday, December 22, 1921, they shall stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, January 3, 1922.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia for the period from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
December 20, 1921.

THE JUDICIARY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning herewith H. R. 6679, entitled: "An act to amend section 108 of an act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911," without my approval.

It appears that through an oversight, consideration has not been given to the act approved February 5, 1913 (37 Stat., 663), creating a new division of the western judicial district of Texas, and providing for terms of court at Pecos, Tex.; also an act approved February 26, 1917 (28 Stat., 939), providing for the creation of an additional division in the northern district of Texas and for the holding of terms of court at Wichita Falls; or of the act approved March 1, 1919 (40 Stat., 1270), amending section 108 of the code in reference to the time of holding court in the Amarilla division of the northern district.

H. R. 6679, as enacted by the Congress, is in conflict with the provisions of the law above cited, and it would doubtless be held that the later act repealed, by implication, the prior inconsistent statutes. Manifestly it was not the intention to give that effect to this amendment. I am, therefore, returning the bill for your further consideration in order that the inconsistencies mentioned above may be rectified before the act is given approval.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 20, 1921.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was about to ask that the message lie on the Speaker's table. However, if the gentleman thinks his is the better course, I shall not interpose objection.

Mr. WALSH. It would seem, in view of the objection raised, that possibly the matter might be given further consideration by the committee, and, if necessary, the proper measure reported out of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, on account of illness in his family.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 2591. An act to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River; and

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members I desire to state that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow I shall move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message. I do not anticipate at this time that there will be any further business than that before the House to-morrow. The debate will be interesting and I feel that all Members would profit by being here.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, there is a possibility of a bill amending the bankruptcy act coming over from the Senate to-morrow. The gentleman's statement would not prevent consideration of that?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know what the bill is which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. LONDON. It passed the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. In that event, if there is clearly no objection to it, we might consider it.

Mr. LONDON. I do not think there will be objection to it.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 22, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

434. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting receipts from rentals, extension Capitol Grounds, for the period December 2, 1920, to and including November 30, 1921; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

3376. Also, resolution of the Larimore Commercial Club, of Larimore, N. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to permit vessels engaged in domestic commerce in the United States to pass through the Panama Canal free from toll, etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we look again unto Thee for Thy favor. We thank Thee for past favors, but we are hungry for present good and ask from Thee the guidance of Thy grace through the day and its duties; and then when the separations come and the home gatherings are had, may such good cheer prevail in each home that it may be the brightest and best of all the experiences in the family situation. Where there may be any sorrow or sickness, and where there is a vacancy in the home, magnify the riches of Thy love in dealing patiently and tenderly, and with the upliftings of Thine own infinite regard quiet the soul at such a time. May great mercy and peace be abundant in each home, in each life. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

ANDRIEUS A. JONES, a Senator from the State of New Mexico; MEDILL MCCORMICK, a Senator from the State of Illinois; and TASKER L. ODDIE, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in their seats to-day.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 22, 1921.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER, a Senator from the State of Missouri, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SPENCER thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16) providing that when the two Houses complete the business of the calendar day of Thursday, December 22, 1921, they shall stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, January 3, 1922.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the following agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes, and that on Wednesday, January 11, 1922, immediately following the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of said bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask the Senator from Arkansas for a brief explanation and whether the proposed agreement will interfere with other unanimous-consent agreements which are pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will not. The unanimous-consent agreement which I have presented is so expressed that it will not interfere with any business of the Senate which has been arranged for.

A number of Senators and Representatives have introduced bills affecting the subject. A subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in May or June considered it, and, according to my information, agreed to report it; but for some reason or other, probably due to the fact that the committee has been busy almost continuously with the consideration of other matters, some of which are deemed more important than this measure, no action has been taken respecting it.

The unanimous-consent agreement does not limit debate or provide expressly for a vote on the bill. It merely provides for the consideration of the bill, but it is, of course, expected that the bill will then be finally disposed of.

I wish to publish in the RECORD the fact that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and a number of Representatives, including Mr. KAHN, of California; Mr. BARCLAY, of Kentucky; Mr. Flood, now deceased, of Virginia; and Mr. JACOWAY, of Arkansas, have introduced bills upon the same subject.

I also wish to print in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a statement explaining the provisions and purposes of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

MILEAGE BOOKS.

There is no one thing that contributes more to the high cost of living than the high cost of railroad travel and railroad freight and express rates, particularly in so far as the commercial life of the Nation is concerned. The railroad rates, both freight and passenger, and the Pullman rates, are to-day prohibitive, and they have practically throttled the business life and commercial development of the Nation and are more to blame than any one thing for the great number of unemployed throughout the country.

During the first six months of this year the passenger fares paid to 168 railroads amounted to $573,254,211, against $564,586,242 for the first six months of 1920 before the increase went into effect, and these fares were paid by 522,195,000 persons, compared with 595,771,000 for the same period of 1920, while the average journey for the 1921 period was 35.04 against 36.41 miles for the 1920 period. Each traveler paid an average of 3.13 cents a mile for his railroad transportation as against 2.60 for the first six months of 1920.

Freight revenues for the first six months of 1921 totaled $1,863,836,308 as against $1,860,948,323 for the 1920 period. The tonnage, however, like the passenger travel, dropped from 1,020,118 in the 1920 period to 779,360 for the 1921 period.

These figures speak for themselves most eloquently, and every week continues to show a decrease in both passenger, freight, and Pullman traffic. It is the old story of killing the goose that lays the golden egg, and unless some measure of relief is found there is nothing ahead but disaster, not only for the railroads but for the commercial existence of our country.

There are now pending before the Congress legislation providing for the issuance of a mileage book, interchangeable, nontransferable, good on all interstate roads, at 2½ cents per mile. * * *

The passage of this legislation would be of great immediate benefit to both the railroads and the country and would do more to relieve the unemployment situation and bring about activity in the agriculture, industrial, and commercial world than any legislation that has been suggested or could be suggested to the Congress at the present time, and it has the unequivocal indorsement of the great traveling public, who represent the lifeblood of the Nation.

The traveling salesmen's association of the United States, having a membership of nearly 1,000,000; the manufacturers and jobbers associations; the theatrical producers associations; the moving-picture industry, and the farming organizations, and the press of the entire country commend and indorse this legislation, which is based upon the simple fact of selling a commodity at wholesale at a cheaper rate, in the same manner as special carload lots are transported at lesser rates, and it is not class legislation or discrimination, for the reason that anyone may have the privilege of purchasing such a book, and therefore is not confined to a commercial traveler, or to a theatrical troupe, and there is no question as to the right of Congress to enact such legislation.

A great benefit to the railroads would lie in the fact that at least 400,000 such books would be immediately purchased which would mean a cash return to them, if the books were for 5,000 miles, of $50,000,000 immediately available; and it is possible that this amount might be doubled which would mean $100,000,000 immediately available. Books would also be purchased by the employers who would buy them for the use of their salesmen in cases where the expenses are advanced and paid by the employer.

A further advantage to the railroads would lie in the fact that clerical help would be saved because the book would be good on all roads, and could be used for checking and paying excess baggage, thereby saving the expense entailed in the issuance of the numerous books, tickets, and checks necessitated at the present time. Also, in the books lost and unredeemed, which the railroad records show amount to several million dollars. This, of course, would be added income to the roads.

To illustrate the wisdom and advantage to the railroads of lower rates, a simple illustration of fact will suffice. It costs to run a train from New York to Washington, New York to Buffalo, or any other distance, a specific sum per train mile, say, $1.60, whether the train contains a locomotive and two cars or a locomotive and 12 cars, and would it not be better for the railroads to haul a 12-car load at capacity, at say, 2½ cents per train mile per passenger, than to haul three cars at 3½ cents per train mile, and these cars not half filled, as they are running to-day? It should not be forgotten that one of the greatest fortunes ever accumulated honestly in this country was accomplished by figuring the costs and the profits in not dollars, not cents, but mills, and the greatest building in the world now stands as a monument to the one who had the wisdom and the foresight to realize that it was better to do a great business with small profit than a small business with big profit.

At present there are very few commercial travelers on the road because of this high cost of travel, and many of the men who are now out are using automobiles to far better advantage than railroad trains, particularly as it saves them baggage trouble and costs of transfer to and from the depots and the hotels, while large shippers have also discovered that they can use automobiles with better results than the railroads, to secure quicker and cheaper freight shipments. Several theatrical troupes are now traveling entirely by automobile, carrying their scenery and baggage with them in large trucks at a much less cost than though they traveled and shipped by rail, and many of the managers report that this method of travel is becoming so popular that it will develop rapidly until used by all "short jump" companies.

Due to this prohibitive cost of travel a depression exists in practically all lines of business, not only the railroads, the Pullman cars, and the hotels, but also the theaters, moving-picture houses, restaurants, department stores, drug stores, news stands, public conveyances, and even newsboys and bootblacks are feeling the decrease in business, and quite naturally it follows that our Government will also feel it in reduced income from its various sources of taxation, that would not have resulted under normal transportation conditions. The President in his wisdom has already suggested in his message to the Congress the necessity for a reduction in transportation rates.

As an evidence of the relief that the traveling public are finding in the automobile, reports show that the use of gasoline has increased over 700,000 gallons daily, compared with the same period last year, a further proof that smaller prices and bigger sales are worth while.

It may be recalled that less than a century ago it cost one shilling—about 25 cents—to pay postage on a letter in Great Britain, and under that system the Post Office Department was run at a loss. When a preacher named Roland Hill proposed to reduce this postage to 1 penny, about 2 cents, the idea was ridiculed, and no less a person than Lord Wellington opposed it as being absolutely absurd and nonsensical. The British Parliament, however, adopted it, and the result was a department that had been running at a loss became immediately successful in accomplishing a profit. History can repeat itself as experience has proven.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Quartermaster General of the Army, transmitting a list of American soldier dead returned from overseas, to be reinterred in Arlington Cemetery Thursday, January 5, 1922, at 2.30 p. m., which was ordered to lie on the table for inspection by Senators.

REPORT OF WAR FINANCE CORPORATION (H. DOC. NO. 143).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, chairman of the War Finance Corporation, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of that corporation covering its activities for the year ended November 30, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RENTAL OF BUILDINGS, ETC., CAPITOL GROUNDS (S. DOC. NO. 110).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of receipts from rentals of buildings, etc., situated upon the extension of the Capitol grounds, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented resolutions adopted by the Central Labor Union of Piqua, Ohio, protesting against the elimination of the Secretary of Labor from the Cabinet, the reorganization of the Department of Labor, and the compulsory investigation of labor disputes for public information, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the fiftieth annual convention of the Kansas State Grange, at Chanute, Kans., commending the efforts of the American delegation to the Conference on the Limitation of Armament to make "peace on earth to men of good will" a reality, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a resolution adopted by the American Legion and citizens of Shirley, Ark., protesting against suspension of train operation over the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CALDER presented a petition of sundry members of Huguenot Lodge, No. 46, Free and Accepted Masons, of New Rochelle, Westchester County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LADD presented three letters in the nature of petitions from Charles B. Hall, E. R. Nobler, and Henry J. Brown, all of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, praying for the passage of Senate bill 2342, to establish an honest money system where the medium of exchange will give equal benefits to every American citizen and wherein the credit of the Government shall be used for the benefit of all the people instead of banking corporations; to reduce the rate of interest of loans, encourage agriculture, the ownership of homes, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Flora, Mayville, McHenry, Glenfield, Courtenay, Kensal, Zap, Gardner, Raub, Turtle Lake, Minot, Mohall, Stanley, Burlington, Berg, Deslacs, Donnybrook, Willow City, Ryder, Coal Harbor, Emmet, and Garrison, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of Senate resolution 133, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the conditions affecting the demand for foreign disposition, movement, and use of American exported grain, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of citizens held at Kuna, Idaho, December 10, 1921, and Local Union, No. 635, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Boise, Idaho, favoring the passage of Senate bill 2604, to establish an honest money system where the medium of exchange will give equal benefits to every American citizen and wherein the credit of the Government shall be used for the benefit of all the people instead of banking corporations; to reduce the rate of interest of loans, encourage agriculture, the ownership of homes, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6380) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 375) thereon.

Mr. KENYON, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (S. 2749) to prepare for future cyclical periods of depression and unemployment by systems of public works, reported it without amendment.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 21, 1921, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 2780) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 2895) for the relief of Lieut. George H. Hauge, United States Army (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2896) for the relief of farmers in crop-failure areas of the United States who had borrowed money to repay to the Government of the United States money advanced to such farmers for the purchase of seed grain; and

A bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2898) for the relief of Levi L. Conright; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2899) for the relief of Capt. Charles A. Bell; and

A bill (S. 2900) for the relief of Bryan J. Roberts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 2901) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved November 23, 1921; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 150) authorizing the President to call an international economic conference for the discussion of the economic problems and questions of international finance, particularly the problem created by the outstanding obligations between certain of the nations as the result of the World War; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on December 21, 1921, the President approved and signed the bill (S. 2780) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended.

RAILROAD AND FOREIGN STEAMSHIP CONTRACTS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a short time ago, in response to a resolution of the Senate, copies of contracts between our railroads and foreign steamship lines were sent to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce. At the same time the Interstate Commerce Commission sent down a summary of those contracts, which, I think, will be very useful to Senators who may not desire to take the time to read all of the contracts. I ask that the summary may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

The summary was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and is as follows:

Agreement between Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railway Co. and the Strachan Shipping Co., entered into on January 18, 1917, to continue for five years, and thereafter indefinitely, with the right of either party to terminate the agreement on six months' notice, provides:

"As the railroad owns a line extending to Brunswick, Ga., and owns and operates certain deep-water terminal facilities at Brunswick, the purpose of the agreement is stated to be the building up of the export (and, if possible, import) traffic through that port. To this end the railroad company was, at all times, to lend its best efforts toward solicitation and development of that traffic. The agreement provided that the shipping company was to maintain neutrality in the routing of traffic as between all rail lines entering Brunswick. It was further provided that on account of the impracticability at all times of loading individual railway traffic from respective railway company's piers, steamers for all destinations would be loaded at the various Brunswick terminals to the best advantage of the steamers to be determined by the shipping company, with the distinct understanding, however, that sufficient steamers were to be loaded at Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic terminals, either wholly or in part, at the discretion of the shipping company, to lift an amount of cargo from said terminals equal to the total quantity of cargo brought to the port of Brunswick by the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic for foreign movement by said steamers."

Agreement between Pennsylvania Railroad Co., Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and the International Mercantile Marine Co., entered into on May 17, 1910, to continue for five years, provides:

"The International Mercantile Marine Co. was to have the exclusive support of the railroads, east and west bound, so far as can legally be done, in the trades to and from Baltimore and Antwerp, Baltimore and Havre, and Baltimore and London, London to be considered as a Pennsylvania Railroad port and Havre to be considered as a Baltimore & Ohio port, and when a full cargo is loaded to either port it is to be loaded at the respective terminals mentioned above. It was further understood that when conditions do not justify loading full cargoes to any one port, the steamers arriving from or going to more than one port are to be alternated between the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore & Ohio, so that the division of tonnage shall be equal, as nearly as may be. The steamers were to have free wharfage as in effect at time agreement was made."

Agreement between North German Lloyd (Ltd.) and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., entered into January 31, 1867, to continue for an indefinite period, but subject to termination on six months' notice by either party, provides:

"The party of the second part, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., bound itself to build and finish at its own expense, before the commencement of the regular trips of the line, the following accommodations and to keep these always in good condition, without charging the party of the first part, the Steamship Co., any rent, taxes, or expenses for repairs whatever, to wit:

"'(a) At a suitable place within the harbor of Baltimore a suitable pier, covered sheds, and necessary offices, and gates to shut the whole; (b) an adjoining coal yard; (c) a warehouse for goods.'

"The railroad company was to keep the wharf accessible for the vessels and the other premises always ready for use and was to try and procure for the warehouse the privilege of a bonded warehouse and to secure exemption for the vessels from city harbor and county taxes, also agreeing to use its influence in obtaining the English mails for the steamers. The agreement also provided that the Baltimore & Ohio was to deliver coal at a price always 50 cents per ton less than the market value at Baltimore, and never to exceed $5 per long ton, such coal to be for the use of the vessels. The lowest rates charged to other parties were to be charged for goods and passengers of and for the ships of the North German Lloyd Line over the roads of the Baltimore & Ohio."

Agreement between the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Scandinavian-American Line, entered into December 24, 1917, to continue for a period of five years, with an option to renew for a like term, provides:

"The steamship company was to maintain regular sailings between Baltimore and Copenhagen and/or Christiania, primarily for the carriage and accommodation of freight transported by or over the lines of said Baltimore & Ohio and its connections. The steamers were to receive and discharge their cargoes at the Locust Point terminals of the Baltimore & Ohio, and the steamship company agreed to cooperate with the railroad in promoting through traffic over the lines of the Baltimore & Ohio by the port of Baltimore.

"The railroad company agreed to furnish free wharfage accommodations for the steamers, and to perform any necessary dredging adjacent to the wharves so that the vessels could dock freely. The Baltimore & Ohio was at all times to use its best endeavors in promotion of the steamship business and maintenance of service.

Agreement between the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Donaldson Line (Ltd.), entered into January 27, 1917, for a period of 10 years, provides:

"The steamship company was to maintain regular sailings between Baltimore and Glasgow, primarily for the carriage and accommodation of freight transported by or over the lines of said Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and its connections. The steamers were to receive and discharge their cargoes at the Locust Point terminals of the Baltimore & Ohio, and the steamship company agreed to cooperate with the railroad in promoting through traffic over the lines of the Baltimore & Ohio by the port of Baltimore.

"The railroad company agreed to furnish free wharfage accommodations for the steamers and to perform any necessary dredging adjacent to the wharves so that the vessels could dock freely. The Baltimore & Ohio was at all times to use its best endeavors in promotion of the steamship business and maintenance of service."

Agreement between the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Johnston Steamship Lines (Ltd.), Furness, Withy & Co. (Ltd.), proprietors, to take effect as of November 1, 1916, and to continue for a period of 10 years, provides:

"The steamship company was to maintain regular sailings between Baltimore and Liverpool, primarily for the carriage and accommodation of freight transported by or over the lines of the Baltimore & Ohio and its connections. The steamers were to receive and discharge their cargoes at the Locust Point terminals of the Baltimore & Ohio and the steamship company agreed to cooperate with the railroad in promoting through traffic over the lines of the Baltimore & Ohio by the port of Baltimore.

"The railroad company agreed to furnish free wharfage accommodations for the steamers and to perform any necessary dredging adjacent to the wharves so that the vessels could dock freely. The Baltimore & Ohio was at all times to use its best endeavors in promotion of the steamship business and maintenance of service."

Agreement between the Cunard Ssteamship Co. and the Boston & Albany Railroad Co. (New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., lessee), entered into July 3, 1901, and to continue for a period of 10 years, and thereafter indefinitely, but subject to termination on 1 year's notice by either party, provides:

"The steamship company agreed to dock its vessels exclusively at docks of railroad company in Boston and there discharge and receive cargoes, if it could safely do so, and to give preference to the railroad company, provided its rates were as low as its competing lines. The steamship company was to collect all wharfage charges and to account to the railroad company for same, less 25 per cent as commission.

"The railroad company agreed to reserve a large portion of its piers for the exclusive use of the vessels of the steamship company and to keep the approaches dredged properly at all times so the vessels may keep afloat. The railroad company agreed to provide at all times for delivering, free of charge, grain from its elevators into the holds of the company's vessels, and to maintain and keep in good working condition all piers and erections thereon, not damaged by the steamship company. The railroad company was to make all reasonable efforts to secure the amount of export freight required by the steamship company, and to make as low rates as those of its competitors. The railroad company was to give the steamship company as advantageous terms and facilities as it allowed any other steamship company using its wharves."

Agreement between Leyland Steamship Line and the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, entered into September 28, 1899, and to continue for an indefinite period, subject to termination on one year's notice from either party, provides:

"The steamship company agreed to dock its vessels exclusively at the docks or wharves of the railroad company, and there discharge and receive its cargoes, so far as it could safely do so, and to give preference and to use its influence in favor of said railroad company, provided its rates were as low as its competing lines.

"The railroad company agreed to reserve a portion of its piers for the exclusive use of the steamship company and to make all reasonable efforts to secure the amount of export freight required by the steamship company, and to make as low rates as those of its competitors. The railroad company, to enable the steamship company to secure freight on reasonable terms in territory not accessible to the railroad company or its connections, further agreed to establish reduced rates with the several divisions of the Boston & Maine, which rates were to include wharfage, labor, and switching charges."

Memorandum of understanding governing the interchange of traffic at the port of Boston, Mass., between the France & Canada Steamship Co. and the Boston & Maine Railroad, entered into on October 27, 1920, but which could be terminated by the railroad at any time, provides:

"The railroad, in so far as possible, was to handle the vessels of the steamship company at Pier 48, provided due notice of their arrival was received. It further agreed to provide necessary wharfage room and cars for cargo and to render the usual facilities for the proper conduct of the traffic, any additional facilities required by the steamship company, including extra lighting, water for vessels, etc., to be paid monthly by the steamship company. No exclusive right to Pier 48 was contemplated, and the steamship company was to pay all storage and tariff charges as named in tariffs filed. The steamship company was to collect wharfage charges as per regulations in effect at the port of Boston and pay 75 per cent over to the railroad. Free use of office space was given the steamship company."

The next nine documents should be considered together, as their provisions are the same, except for necessary changes in names, ports, etc.

The first is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Fowey Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The second is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Sweden-Norway Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The third is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Leyland Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The fourth is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic at the Port of Boston, Mass., Between the Boston & Maine Railroad and Furness, Withy & Co. (Ltd.), in Connection with Steamship Services of the Latter Company Between the Port of Boston and Various Ports in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

The fifth is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the American & Indian Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The sixth is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the China & Japan Steamship Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The seventh is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Scandinavian-American Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The eighth is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Red Star Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

The ninth is entitled "Memorandum of Understanding Covering Interchange of Traffic Between Boston & Maine Railroad and the Wilson Line at the Port of Boston, Mass.," and was executed on June 8, 1917.

"The agreements between the Boston & Maine Railroad and the different steamship companies are the same, and provide: No exclusive facilities were to be furnished by the Boston & Maine to the steamship lines, but the former undertook to handle the steamers at particular wharves specified; otherwise at such space as may be available at Boston & Maine Railroad terminals on arrival of vessel. Traffic exchanged between the railroad company and the steamship companies was to be subject to the regular wharfage charges of the port. Traffic on which wharfage or half wharfage is assessed does not come into the possession of the Boston & Maine Railroad as a common carrier; wharfage charges are collected by the steamship companies, 75 per cent being remitted to the railroad and 25 per cent retained by the steamship companies, for this service."

Agreement entered into December 30, 1905, to continue for five years, but subject to termination on 12 months' notice from the steamship company to the railroad companies, between the Virginia Line and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., the Norfolk & Western Railway Co., and the Southern Railway Co., provides:

"The steamship company was to maintain regular sailings between Norfolk or Newport News, Va., and London and Liverpool for the accommodation of freight transported over the lines of the railroad companies. So far as the railroad companies could control the same, all goods, etc., intended for export to ports mentioned, were to be shipped over the steamship line. The rates of freight to be paid the steamship company were not to be less than the Baltimore ocean freights for the same articles. All freight engagements made by the railways were subject to confirmation by the steamship company. When goods were imported into the country under through rates, the inland rates were to be the same as the Baltimore inland all-rail rates on similar goods.

"The railroad companies were to extend their best efforts to promote traffic over the lines of the steamship company, and the steamship company was to use its best efforts to promote the traffic over the railway companies' lines. The railway companies were to afford the steamship company every reasonable facility for the reception and delivery of traffic, and were to act as agents of the steamship company in the solicitation of freight traffic, free of charge. The railway at whose port the vessel called was to make no charge for wharfage."

A supplemental agreement, dated July 22, 1910, shows that the Furness Withy Co. had acquired the interest of the Virginia Line, and its name was substituted in the above agreement. The supplemental agreement also provided for the extension of the principal agreement for a period of five years from October 1, 1910, upon the same terms.

Agreement between Osaka Mercantile Steamship Co. (Ltd.) and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., dated ——— day of ———, 1908 (to take effect from date of signing), and to continue until March 1, 1919, provides:

"The railroad company was to establish and maintain the necessary train and terminal service to promptly and properly handle the traffic to be delivered to and received from the steamship company. Each party agreed not to become interested in any other steamship or railroad company that might be in competition with the other. The railroad company was to get the preference in shipments of freight, and freight tendered to the steamship company by the railroad company was to be given the preference. The earnings upon the joint through freight business were to be divided between the parties in certain proportions named in the agreement.

"The steamship company was to represent the railroad company in Japan and China, and in the United States and Canada the railroad company was to represent the steamship company, without commission on either side, and both parties could issue through bills of lading covering transportation over the other. The railroad company was to construct and maintain the necessary safe berths for the docking of the vessels of the steamship company, together with a warehouse for the interchange of freight, at its own expense. Neither party was to do or to permit its agents to do anything in violation of the interstate commerce law."

Agreement entered into May 6, 1915, to continue to May 1, 1925, with privilege of renewal, between the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and the Atlantic Fruit Co.

As the railroad company owned certain wharf and dock premises in the East River, and as the fruit company, operating a line of steamers between New York and Central and South America, desired to secure wharf facilities in New York City, the agreement provided:

"The steamship company could use so much of the pier of the railroad company as it required for the proper handling and storage of its cargoes, space to be provided for the receipt of cargo in advance of sailing. The fruit company, at its own expense, agreed to comply with all regulations of the city, State, and Nation governing the port.

"The railroad company was to keep the premises in good condition, and each party was to endeavor to promote the business of the other. For damages to the piers, etc., caused by fire or the elements deduction in the rent charged the fruit company should be made. The fruit company was to pay $10,000 per annum for the use of the premises, and also to pay its fair proportion in keeping the slip dredged."

Agreement entered into between Grand Trunk Railway System and White-Star-Dominion Line, to take effect August 12, 1913, and continue indefinitely, provides:

"Steamship service shall be maintained between Portland, Me., and Liverpool by the steamship company. Railroad company was to give active support in connection with traffic and provide full cargoes as far as practicable at rates named by the steamship company, which, it was understood, were to be based on rates prevailing from Boston. The steamship company was to cooperate in the solicitation of such traffic. All bonding charges on import and export traffic were to be absorbed by the railroad company. Elevating of grain was to be done by the railroad company at its own expense, and free wharfage was to be given the vessels of the steamship company. Rates the same as to and from Boston were to be charged, both on import traffic and traffic intended for export. Steamship company was to be responsible to the railroad company for collection of all inland charges on eastbound freight."

Supplemental agreement entered into April 20, 1912, between Great Northern Railway Co. and the Nippon Steamship Co. provides "that as the steamship company had a previous agreement with the railroad company for the use of certain of its wharves at Seattle and it now desired to secure from the railway company clerical assistance in manifesting cargoes to its boats at said wharves, the railway company agreed to furnish such clerical assistance for such purposes, and the steamship company was to pay $10 for such assistance for the sailing of each of its vessels."

Agreement entered into between Great Northern Railway Co. and Great Northern Express Co. and the Nippon Steamship Co., dated November 1, 1911 (canceling agreement of Nov. 1, 1908), to continue for 10 years, with right of termination by either party on 12 months' notice, provides:

"Steamship company was to maintain service between Seattle and Japan and return. Railroad company was to designate wharves at which vessels should dock, and were to exercise its best endeavors to secure exemption from or reduction in port, pilotage, lighthouse, dues, etc. Each party was to use its best endeavors to secure through cargoes, and could issue through bills of lading. All expenses in connection with clearances of cargoes were to be borne by the railroad company. The railroad company could determine and name railway lines and express companies over which through cargoes should be carried. Railroad company was to forward through cargoes on lines of steamship company only, save under exceptional circumstances. Each company was to act as the agent of the other in their respective home lands."

Agreement between the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co. and Munson Steamship Line, effective November 15, 1905, to continue in effect for 20 years, provides:

"Steamship company operated a line between Mobile, Ala., and points in Cuba and other West Indian ports. Railroad company was to give steamship company adequate and safe facilities for docking its vessels free of charge, which were also to be maintained by the railroad company in a safe condition. The railroad's labor force on the pier was to be under the control of the steamship company.

"The steamship company was to unload all its inbound and outbound traffic at said pier, but there was to be no discrimination against the Mobile & Ohio. The parties mutually agreed to promote each other's traffic, but nothing in the agreement was to conflict with the interstate commerce act."

An agreement was entered into on December 28, 1917, to continue indefinitely between various steamship agents and various railway companies, all reaching and serving the port of New Orleans, by which the steamship agents agreed to pay all demurrage charges of the railroad companies accruing at New Orleans under the same terms and conditions as the demurrage rules filed by the companies with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

An agreement of the New York, Ontario & Western Railway Co. provided that through export bills of lading will be issued only when founded on written ocean contract, and then only when shipper gives written guaranty that any demurrage or storage charges accruing at the seaboard will be paid.

EXCEPTION NO. 1.

"Under an agreement between the Railroad Administration and the Shipping Board on behalf of steamship lines serving North Atlantic ports it was provided:

"Through export bills of lading will be issued only when founded on written ocean contract and on traffic moving under railroad transportation permit.

"Carload freight covered by through export bills of lading will be held in warehouse for 15 days free of charge; after that regular tariff and storage charges as on file with Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

EXCEPTION NO. 2.

"On export carload freight moving in connection with steamship lines not named in exception No. 1, the same rules as contained in exception No. 1, except it provides for only 10 days' free time."

An agreement dated December 30, 1905, between Virginia Line and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. and the Norfolk & Western Railway Co., to continue for five years from October 1, 1905, but subject to termination on 12 months' notice, provides:

"The steamship company shall maintain regular sailings between Norfolk, Newport News, and Liverpool or London. All goods passing over railway companies for export shall be forwarded over vessels of company at rates not less than the Baltimore rates. The inland rates on through shipments shall be the same as the Baltimore rates on same shipments. Freight engagements made by the steamship company were to be reported to and confirmed by the railroad companies. There were mutual agreements to promote and improve the service of each other. The railroad companies were to offer every reasonable facility for the reception and delivery of all traffic from the steamship company to the railroad companies and to act as agents of the steamship company free.

"By a supplemental agreement the Furness Withy Co. was substituted for the Virginia Line, and the agreement was extended to October 1, 1910."

Memorandum of understanding between the Northern Central Railway Co. and the International Mercantile Marine Co. on import traffic handled over the International Mercantile Marine Pier in Baltimore Harbor, formerly known as the Atlantic Transport Pier.

This arrangement was to take effect January 1, 1904, was subject to cancellation on three months' notice, and was subject to revision January 1, 1905. It provides:

"As the steamship lines maintain and operate their own piers for the handling of all import traffic, the Northern Central Railway Co. agrees to pay the International Mercantile Marine Co. 40 cents a ton on all import traffic forwarded in cars over the railroad to any point reached by said line or connections where the freight rate is $1 or more per ton, but in no case is this allowance to exceed more than $8,000 per annum. When a charge for the storage of freight on piers is collected from the owners such revenue shall be retained by the steamship company, but the steamship company is to make no charge for storage when requested not to by the railroad company."

Memorandum of agreement made on October 5, 1909, between the Northern Central Railway Co. and Furness, Withy & Co. (Ltd.), to continue in effect for an indefinite term, provides:

"The purpose of the agreement was to establish and develop the trade between Baltimore, Md., and Leith, Scotland, and vice versa.

"The railroad company agreed that it would provide, without expense to the steamship company, the necessary dock accommodations at its terminals at Canton for the loading and discharging of steamers, with suitable offices on the dock for the use of the steamship company. The railroad company was to use its best endeavors to promote the interests of the steamship company.

"The steamship company agreed to provide two steamers a month, both eastbound and westbound, and that it would, whenever possible, deliver to the railroad company all freight imported over their line from or through Leith and bound to points on the railroad company and its connections. Each party was to exercise its best efforts to promote the interchange of business tributary to both companies as against their competitors."

Memorandum of agreement for the handling of import and export freight via the port of Philadelphia between the International Mercantile Marine Co. and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., effective November 1, 1913, continuing indefinitely, but subject to cancellation on three months' notice. The agreement provides:

"As the steamship company desires to use certain piers belonging to the railroad company, the railroad company agreed to allow the steamship company the free use of said piers under the conditions: The piers are not to be used for storage, save with permission of the railroad company. The railroad company was to have the use of the piers at any time for docking steamers, provided it did not interfere with the steamship company. The railroad company was to do the necessary dredging, to make repairs, and to insure the piers, bulkhead sheds, etc.

"The steamship company assumed the cost of heating, lighting, and policing the docks, sheds, etc. The steamship company was to perform the labor in loading and unloading cars, but the railroad company was to pay 20 cents a ton to the steamship company as its share of such expense, except that this arrangement was to apply only to traffic exchanged with the railroad company and handled over the piers, and was not to apply to traffic such as grain and lightered freight which was not so handled."

Agreement entered into so as to become effective on January 1, 1910, and to remain in effect for three years, between F. D. M. Strachan and the Southern Railway Co. provides:

"For the purpose of mutual benefit and to build up commerce between Brunswick, Ga., and foreign ports:

"The steamship company agreed to have such regular sailings as the traffic justified, and the railway company agreed to use its best efforts to obtain such cargoes at ocean rates, having a fair relation to rates from South Atlantic ports, as would insure the successful operation of the vessels. The steamship company was to land and take cargoes at the docks of the railway company free of expense. The railway company agreed, if lawful, not to issue through bills of lading by steamers sailing from Brunswick other than those of the steamship company. The steamship company was not to enter into any agreement to supply ocean service to others without consent of the railroad company. If there was any import business developed at this port, the railway company was to have the preference in handling it."

"By letter dated February 3, 1916, the railway company agreed to pay Mr. Strachan, of the steamship company, $4,000 per year, together with pay roll, etc., expenses, for handling export arrangements at Brunswick."

Agreement entered into August 15, 1906, to continue in effect for one year, and thereafter indefinitely, subject to termination on 60 days' notice, between the Southern Railway Co. and the Munson Steamship Line, provides:

"Steamship company was to operate a service between Mobile and Habana and other Cuban ports, together with sailings for Mexican and West Indian ports, as the traffic warranted. Each company mutually agreed to stimulate and increase the traffic over the other's line. The railroad company agreed not to discriminate against the traffic of the steamship company, and the steamship company agreed not to discriminate against the traffic of the railroad company. The agreement was not to conflict with the interstate commerce act."

Agreement entered into July 8, 1910, to continue in effect until August 31, 1911, and thereafter for an indefinite period, subject to termination on 6 months' notice, between the Mobile Liners (Inc.) and the Southern Railway Co. and Mobile & Ohio Railway Co., provides:

"For the purpose of mutual benefit and to build up commerce between Mobile, Ala., and foreign ports:

"The steamship company agreed to have such regular sailings as the traffic justifies, and to provide at least 50 per cent of regular line tonnage for the cotton trade.

"The railroad companies agreed to provide the steamship company with properly equipped berths for discharge and receipt of cargoes. The steamship company agreed to give preference as regards storage space and handling cargo to the railroad companies. No dockage, wharfage, or other charges were to be assessed against the steamship company's vessels, and the railroad companies were to do whatever dredging was necessary. Prompt and efficient switching was to be performed of all cargo in cars ordered to vessels of the steamship company. If for any reason the vessels were obliged to dock at other wharves, the railroad companies would be responsible for such cost, provided their rails reached such dock. The steamship company agreed to insure to the railroad companies ocean rates not higher than those prevailing on competitive export traffic from New Orleans. The steamship company was not to enter into any agreement to supply ocean service from Mobile with other transportation companies save by permission or consent of the railroad companies. The steamship company further agreed not to accept lower rates from any other railroads, etc., than are accepted from these railroad companies, and agreed to work preferentially with the railroad companies on competitive business. The railroad companies were to have the preference in transporting any import traffic. The railroad companies were to give the steamship company first offer of any cargo controlled by them."

Agreement entered into May 13, 1912, to continue from September 15, 1912, for 10 years, and thereafter subject to termination on six months' notice, between the Munson Steamship Line and the Mobile & Ohio and Southern Railway Cos., provides:

"The purpose of the agreement was to upbuild commerce between Mobile, Ala., and South American ports. For such purpose the steamship company was to furnish regular sailings as the volume of traffic warranted. The railroad companies were to work exclusively with the steamship line on all matters of water transportation on business through the port of Mobile. The steamship company agreed to do all in its power to stimulate traffic over the line of the railroad companies. The steamship company agreed not to operate any vessel service between Gulf ports and South American ports, except on yellow-pine lumber, except with the consent of the railroad companies. The railroad companies agreed to do all in their power to expand the traffic from the territory served by them over the steamship line.

"The railroad companies agreed to furnish piers for the steamers of the steamship line, and the steamship line could erect thereon any labor-saving device it wished, to be the property of the steamship company. The railroad companies could agree to purchase such devices or machinery. The railroad companies were to furnish inspectors to supervise the loading of freight on cars when done by the steamship company. The railroad companies agreed to keep the pier in good condition and repair and do any necessary dredging, while the steamship company agreed to load and discharge all traffic at said pier.

"The steamship company, in the interchange of traffic, was not to discriminate in any way against the railroad companies, and was not to enter into any traffic contract with other rail lines at Mobile without the approval and consent of the railroad companies.

"Nothing in the agreement was to be permitted to conflict with the interstate commerce act."

Memorandum concerning intention of United States Railroad Administration of issuing through bills of lading on shipments of overland exports and imports through Puget Sound and Columbia River ports in connection with only such water carriers, and of doing business with only such dock operators at said ports as will assent to the following:

"A charge of 30 cents a ton on outgoing cargo and of 25 cents a ton on incoming cargo, to be made by dock as wharfage on all cargo passing over same. On outgoing cargoes this charge was to appear on bill of lading of rail carrier, and on incoming cargoes it was to appear in bill of lading of water carrier and be by it collected. The rail carrier was to unload the cargo from cars and put same at proper place on dock, from which place it was to be taken by the water carrier. The prices to be agreed upon between the parties were to be fair and just, covering actual expense of handling, supervision, charge, etc. The manner of assessing demurrage charges is then stated."

Memorandum of agreement entered into September 1, 1920, for an indefinite period, but which may be terminated on 60 days' notice, by and between the General Steamship Corporation and the Union Pacific Railroad Co., Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., and the St. Joseph & Grand Island Railway Co. provides:

"The Steamship Corporation intends to establish monthly sailings between Seattle, Wash., and principal New Zealand and Australian ports, in addition to sailings between Seattle and Central and South American and Mexican ports, and it is desired that the parties to the agreement enter into preferential relations with respect to the routing of traffic.

"Wherever possible the Steamship Corporation agrees to route inbound and outbound traffic via the lines of the railroads, and the railroad companies agreed to prefer the vessels of the steamship line. The Steamship Corporation was to furnish railroad companies any information it might have as to movements of traffic, so as to give the railroad companies a chance to compete for same."

RUSSIAN TRADE.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the News Scimitar, of Memphis, Tenn., in relation to the recent address by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] in regard to Russian trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Editorial from the Memphis News Scimitar of Dec. 20, 1921.]

RUSSIAN TRADE.

Senator FRANCE, who recently returned from Russia, denies the charge that has been so frequently made that he favors the recognition of the Russian Government.

On the other hand, the Senator declares that he has urged upon the Secretary of State the importance of sending a commission to Russia to investigate conditions and to discuss with the de facto government questions of possible difference between the two countries.

In his opinion the time is opportune to begin negotiations with Russia with the view to helping her people solve the problems concerning them, and to open up the markets of Russia to American goods.

Senator FRANCE spent some months in Russia, during which time he made careful study of conditions, and like most other men who have been there in recent months, recognizes the possibility for the utilization of commodities for which there is no market at present in this country.

In the course of his statement setting forth his interest and his reason for advocating the appointment of a commission to visit Russia, he says:

"My interest in the rehabilitation of Europe has been prompted by my interest in the welfare of the farmers, of the workers, and of the business men of America. We are suffering here an agricultural, industrial, and financial depression which is wholly unnecessary and which is due to the fact that we are not able to sell our surplus foodstuffs and manufactured articles to Europe. During the first 10 months of 1920 our exports were in round numbers $6,800,000,000, while in the same period of 1921 they were approximately $3,800,000,000.

"I called attention to the fact that this sum of $3,000,000,000 would have been more than sufficent to pay 4,000,000 men $70 a month for 10 months. Our exports have fallen off while Europe requires our goods in quantities perhaps as great as those required during the period of the war. Our farmers have on hand great supplies of wheat, corn, cotton, and wool, while millions of people in Europe face starvation and disease or death from exposure to the cruel blasts of winter unprotected by the proper clothing. Our shoe factories are marking time while millions in Europe must walk the winter snows unshod. Many of our machinists, our steel workers, are idle. Our railroad equipment, factories, all lines of industry are running but a portion of the time, while Russia needs machinery, steel products, railroad equipment, tools, and almost every conceivable manufactured article. America should have an opportunity of supplying this need for her own interest and for the sake of humanity.

"The policy of sending a commission to Russia is not a radical policy. It is one conceived for the very purpose of looking after our trade interests, as the British, as the Italians, as the Germans, as the Chinese, and as other countries are looking after theirs in Russia. We have been relying entirely upon the information furnished us by other countries concerning Russia, whereas undoubtedly those countries have been and are interested in keeping us alienated from the Russian people and separated from the great Russian markets."

It is true that so long as this country relies upon information furnished it by other nations for the determination of its trade policy it will remain in the dark.

The United States is as capable as any other nation of investigating conditions in Russia, and unless it sends its own representatives to that country it is not likely to learn very much about it. The other nations will tell us just what they want us to know, which is nothing.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMOOT. I submit the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2, and from the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill.

REED SMOOT,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
H. W. TEMPLE,
TOM CONNALLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, what I am required to do this morning is apparently ungracious, as the Congress desires to adjourn for the holidays, but my task must be performed. I shall restrain the oratorical impetuosity and tumultuous emotion which I feel as I reflect upon the foul injustice that is being perpetrated upon many of our ex-service men suffering from tuberculosis. I now thank not only the conferees on the part of the Senate but also the conferees on the part of the House on the Russian relief bill. They accorded to me a privilege not usually extended to Members of either House. I made it known to the conferees that I desired to be heard on my two amendments, which the Senate adopted, to the Russian relief bill, and the chairman of the conference committee [Mr. SMOOT] was so kind as to come to me and advise me that they were in session. I was accorded, not only by the Senate conferees but also by the House conferees, a patient hearing, and I have reason to believe both of my amendments would have been agreed to had it not been for the reactionary and archaic rules of another branch of Congress which prevented the House conferees from agreeing to the amendments. I have, therefore, no quarrel with the conferees on this bill, but I quarrel with the rules of another body of the Congress.

I direct attention to the somnolence that has come upon the American Congress, a sleepiness which neither "poppy nor mandragora nor all the drowsy sirups of the world could produce." I am at eternal war with this Congress or any Congress that will be silent, inert, and asleep when it should be lit by the passion of justice. Meanwhile what are the facts?

On the 17th of last October I received the following telegram from the governor of Arizona, a gentleman of good judgment and of accurate expression:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., October 17, 1921.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Director Forbes of Veterans' Bureau has submitted report to President strongly urging immediate action to meet present emergency arising from needs of hundreds of disabled former service men who, with approach of winter, are pouring into Arizona, where facilities for their care are very inadequate. He recommends immediate completion of Whipple building program through letting of contracts, it being obvious that under system now in effect winter will be well over before any of the buildings now under construction will be ready for occupancy. Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district, is now in Washington, and I therefore urge that Arizona congressional delegation take prompt action, conferring with Maj. Grant and Director Forbes and calling on the President, bringing strongly to his attention the desperate situation in which these men find themselves and pointing out necessity for immediate action along following lines: Speeding up of construction program at Whipple, establishment of vocational-training center at Prescott, acquirement of additional hospital facilities at Phoenix, and construction of cottages at Tucson to accommodate approximately 300 more patients. The need is very real, and I urgently bespeak your hearty cooperation.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor.

Immediately upon the receipt of that telegram I called upon Mr. C. R. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and he said to me, "Senator, the governor has not overstated nor misstated the situation. We are trying to save the lives of the tubercular ex-service men who are pouring into the Southwest. We must have action, and we must have the nerve to sever the damnable red tape that is hindering efficient work."

Now, Mr. President, whether the common opinion of our countrymen to the effect that the Southwest with its balmy air and salubrious climate is a specific for tuberculosis is erroneous or not, nevertheless it is the common opinion not only of the laity but of many members of the medical profession that the Southwest is a specific for tuberculosis. I do not argue that question at this time. I leave the question to the physicians to answer; but I do assert, and no Senator would deny, that it is a common belief throughout our country that those persons suffering from tuberculosis who go to the Southwest find relief from the great white plague and that there the progress of their disease is arrested.

Therefore many ex-service men suffering from tuberculosis which they contracted while in the honorable service of their country drift into the Southwest, largely at their own expense, not by the dozens but by the scores. The local physicians there have measured up splendidly to their high and arduous profession; the charitable organizations, the State authorities, and the county authorities have done their full duty in attempting to care for these men, and yet with all the superb work that the people have done, that the State has done, and that the Public Health Service has done, there still remains much more to be done. I could litter these desks with letters from ex-soldiers in Arizona who have gone there in search of health and are now suffering from the lack of proper hospitalization.

On December 12 when the deficiency appropriation bill was before the Senate I offered the following amendment thereto, and the same was agreed to by the Senate:

That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, approach work, roads, and trackage facilities leading thereto, vehicles, live stock, furniture, equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. Such hospital plants and the location and nature thereof, whether for the treatment of tuberculosis, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

That for carrying into effect the preceding paragraph relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000 to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

In support of that amendment I spoke, in part, as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the time has arrived in the progress of hospitalizing the ex-service men when no further explanations or excuses may be offered. The situation is one which calls for immediate action. There is in this pending bill a provision to appropriate $1,000,000 to enable the Government of the United States to take part in the International Exposition at Rio de Janeiro. Naturally the opulent Government of the United States, which courts and deserves the esteem of other powers and other peoples, can not be oblivious to the fact that we should in due time take our proper part in the International Exposition at Rio de Janeiro, which will require the expenditure of $1,000,000; but are we prepared to vote $1,000,000 to take part in the International Exposition at Brazil when in one town in the United States 950 tubercular soldiers are suffering from neglect? Are Senators ready on their conscience to say that they prefer that this $1,000,000 shall be spent for an international exposition rather than for the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers? * * * On Armistice Day we had services in honor of the unknown dead; and the private soldier was permitted to stand on the sidewalk and see the procession go by. Fifty thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress for the purpose of making arrangements for the exercises, and this sum was spent in giving admirals and generals and high foreign dignitaries seats; but the "gold star" mother received scant attention; no gold-star mother was brought here to participate in those exercises. All the soft seats and all the carriages and the equipages were preempted by generals and admirals and high foreign dignitaries. Now, with ex-service men suffering from neglect on the streets of Phoenix, Ariz., we are going to "shell out" $1,000,000 to participate in an exposition in Brazil, but refuse to hospitalize those who stood in the iron storm of war and breathed poison gases in order that our civilization might be saved.

On the same bill to which my amendment was attached appropriating $1,000,000 for further hospitalization of ex-soldiers there was also attached by the Senate an amendment appropriating $100,000 to be expended by the Department of Labor in bringing the man to the job and the job to the man. I had the honor to be present at a meeting of the unemployment conference called by President Harding. I there met workingmen whose speeches showed that they possessed fully as firm a grasp upon fundamentals in government as any Senator here.

The unemployment conference recommended that $400,000 be spent by the Department of Labor in finding employment for those who desire to work; not to be spent in bounties, gifts, and largesses out of the Treasury, but to assist honest, upstanding workingmen to find a chance and an opportunity to earn their daily bread.

The time has come in Congress and out to stop this soft talk; this ballyho and this twiddling of melting notes on the harp of sociability and acquiescence; the time has come to act. When this $400,000 item for finding employment for idle men reached Gen. Dawes his knife and scalpel carved the amount to the bone, but even Gen. Dawes found that $200,000 was absolutely necessary, so he recommended that sum.

The emotionless, self-contained, and detached Senate felt, however, that Gen. Dawes had been extravagant, so the Senate adopted an amendment appropriating only $100,000, or one-half the amount Gen. Dawes said was necessary.

When this deficiency bill reached the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, my amendment appropriating $1,000,000 for further hospitalization of ex-service men and the amendment providing $100,000 to relieve unemployment lasted about as long as would a waxen taper in a blazing temple and both were rejected by the conferees.

On December 14, when the conference report on the deficiency bill was considered by the Senate, I spoke in part as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. I shall not take time now to go over the ground I traversed on last Monday. The Senate will remember that I presented a status of affairs which I believe convinced every Senator of the necessity for immediate action regarding the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers. The Senate adopted my amendment which appropriated $1,000,000 to be spent by the director of the United States Veterans' Bureau or in such other manner as the executive branch might see fit, for the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers who were gathering in large numbers throughout the Southwest, attracted there, as I said, by the widespread opinion, shared not only in the West but throughout all portions of our country, that in the Southwest a specific, the healing air, could be found for their great plague, tuberculosis.

The Senate was convinced that a real necessity existed.

I did not happen to have in my pocket or amongst my papers on Monday, when I made my speech on this subject, a telegram which I shall now read. This is the telegram from Dr. Sweek, of Arizona, of the Public Health Service:

"Exact figures impossible. Lowest estimates 950 active cases vicinity of Phoenix. Four hundred should be hospitalized but not willing to enter present contract hospital. Number of cases in Arizona that would enter properly conducted hospital, lowest estimate, 1,500. Present number hospitalized here, 104. Any size institution up to 1,500 would be full nine months of year. Hospital for 400 could be kept full year round for 25 years. Attending specialists available. Expensive resident staff of full time men unnecessary. Would like opportunity to make this model hospital. Great need for hospital here, as men come from all States. Proper care here would prevent widespread criticism. As disease advances the number here increases as Southwest is used as last resort."

* * * * * * *

Now, Mr. President, I submit that in time of war it is right for the superior officer to say where a soldier shall go, whether it costs the soldier's life or not, but after he has gone faithfully through the war, after he has had practically every segment of his lungs burned and torn away by the enemy's gas, it is not humane, it is not just to him to say, "You shall go where we say or you shall die." A humanitarian government, a just government, will say to him, "If you share the common belief that your plague will be lifted and your disease arrested in some particular climate and you have gone there in large numbers, in good faith, at your own expense, in that belief, then a rich and opulent government will set up a hospital there for you."

I repeate the Senate conferees are entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the manly way in which they struggled to save this amendment appropriating the $1,000,000, and if a thousand ex-soldiers die from neglect, abandoned by the most powerful and opulent Government, the blame will not rest upon the Senate, but will rest upon those who are so bound by red tape that they are no longer free men.

* * * * * * *

In company with Gov. Campbell, of Arizona, Representative HAYDEN, and Mr. D. B. Heard, editor of the Arizona Republican, I called upon the President and read to him the telegram from Dr. Sweek.

The President manifested every attention and proved himself to be what he is believed to be, a man of heart and brain, willing to give civil consideration to any important matter that a citizen sees fit to present. I do not feel at liberty to quote him.

Many times when ex-service men in Phoenix, Tucson, or Prescott suffering from tuberculosis are offered transportation and offered hospitalization elsewhere, they will not go away because they believe the progress of their disease will be arrested in those genial climes, and shall the Government be so rigid and so hardhearted as to say to the soldier, "You shall be hospitalized where we want you hospitalized, or you may go to your grave"? That is the issue before us.

German bullets and German gas cost the lives of scores of thousands of Americans during the World War, but if American red tape now in existence is to continue it will cost the lives of thousands more.

As a sample of the methods pursued by the Government, I will read from a letter of Dr. Redewill, of Phoenix:

PHOENIX, December 13.

There are hundreds of boys in Phoenix that need hospital care and a large number of them want to come to Desert Inn, but on account of the opposition to our place we are unable to take care of any of these men. On the other hand, two years ago we had some 20 soldiers paying their own way here at Desert Inn and were perfectly contented, but when the Public Health Service told them that they could not stay here if they wanted to receive compensation, but that if they went to the Phoenix Sanitarium it would not cost them anything for their board and they would also receive their compensation they all left here, thus not only taking away our contract but also a certain amount of income from our place by taking these soldiers away from us when they were contented to pay their own way rather than receive free board at the Phoenix Sanitarium.

For a reasonable sum of money the Public Health Service could acquire the Deaconess Hospital at Phoenix and could, at comparatively small expense, soon complete the same and thus care for scores of men now requiring treatment, but the Treasury Department has closed its ears and eyes to all arguments in favor of purchasing and completing this hospital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator will agree with me that one of the curses that has directly affected some of our soldier boys throughout the United States has been the treatment they have received through some of the private hospitals.

Mr. ASHURST. Why, then, do some of the soldiers want to go to private hospitals?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know.

Mr. ASHURST. If they are so terribly abused, why do they want to go there?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that they all are, and this may not be one of those places. I do not say that. I do not know anything about it; but I do know that in some of the private hospitals of this country our soldiers have been outrageously treated.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I am not speaking of any private hospitals except those in the Southwest.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows more about this case than I do, because this may be a perfectly first-class hospital, and perhaps even better than the one the Public Health Service has designated; but power had to be given to the Public Health Service, or, now, the Veterans' Bureau, to select the places where the boys should be sent so that they could control them, so that they could have an investigation made, and so that if complaints were made they could go at once and see that they were rectified, if any wrong was done the soldier.

The Senator is not any more anxious to see those boys taken care of than I am. I have tried to further the legislation in their behalf in this body right along; and the Senator knows that I never would submit to any kind of legislation that would in any way be a detriment to the soldier boys.

Mr. ASHURST. I know that to be true. Men differ in views and temperaments; some ex-service men prefer the large United States Public Health Service hospitals, whilst some desire treatment in the smaller or private hospitals and some prefer the so-called home treatment.

I desire to allow the ex-service man to make his own choice in cases where at all practicable.

Mr. President, the Senate has not been entirely inactive in this matter. A resolution was introduced (S. Res. 59) by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], demanding an investigation. The committee was appointed, and on August 24 it made a partial report signed by Senators SUTHERLAND, CALDER, WELLER, WALSH of Massachusetts, and POMERENE. Twelve recommendations were made. The first recommendation was:

(1) That the Director of Veterans' Bureau be authorized to provide additional hospitals according to the recommendations of the board of consultants at a cost of $16,400,000, and that an appropriation of that amount be made available without delay.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I will say, in reference to the statement the Senator has just made, that that recommendation was made by the special committee of the Senate after months of inquiry and investigation. We made that as our first recommendation, and the most important one.

Mr. ASHURST. So I am reinforced by the statement of the industrious junior Senator from New York, who says that after months of patient investigation his committee unanimously reached the conclusion that $16,400,000 should be placed in the hands of Director Forbes.

At this juncture I must state that when my amendment appropriating $1,000,000 was agreed to by the Senate on the 12th instant it was said—and I am not going to give names—"Senator, you ought not to lodge that authority in Col. Forbes. You should have lodged the authority with the Treasury Department." When my second amendment, adopted by the Senate on the 20th instant, lodged the authority with the Treasury Department, it was said to me, "You should have lodged the authority with Col. Forbes."

I say in reply, "You can not ping-pong me. You may play ping-pong in the parlors of the dilettante, but not with me."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has not Col. Forbes, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, authority to make contracts with individual hospitals for the care of soldiers?

Mr. ASHURST. Not as will enable him to acquire new hospitals.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He has no such authority?

Mr. ASHURST. He has no such authority, and he has no money with which to do it if he wished to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am afraid the Senator is misinformed about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the Senator is.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Sweet bill gives him ample authority.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, I will withdraw that statement. He has authority to administer existing facilities, but he has no funds and no authority to cope with the situation as it expands and enlarges.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I correctly understood the question of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I can answer it by an actual example, where the veterans of the American Legion established and equipped a hospital at Battle Creek, Mich. They have entered into a contract with Mr. Forbes for the care of tuberculosis patients, who have been sent there to the number of about 300.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to hear it; I assert again that Col. Forbes has no authority to make contracts for the purchase of additional hospitals.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator is correct in the statement that Col. Forbes can not build any new hospitals.

Mr. ASHURST. That is it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But he has authority, and has the money also, to make temporary arrangements for the care of patients while hospitals are being built.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

So this report of the Senate investigating committee was submitted to the Senate. Their first recommendation was that $16,400,000 be expended for further hospitalization.

Now, I have been severe upon that committee. I said, publicly and privately, that I thought they were guilty of a flagrant disregard of their duties when they omitted to go to Arizona and investigate conditions there, but I am beginning to believe that they knew to whom they were reporting. Of what avail would it be to go to Arizona and investigate, when the recommendations they have made as to conditions here are ignored? Their recommendations have been disregarded and forgotten, so I probably owe that committee—composed of Senators SUTHERLAND CALDER, WELLER, POMERENE, and WALSH—an apology for the criticisms I directed against them because of their failure to go to Arizona and investigate.

Mr. President, a cry of anguish and despair came to us from starving Russia—Russia that mysterious land; that spinner of webs; that people of mysticism and orientalism which will some day contribute not a little to the material wealth of the world.

A bill appropriating $20,000,000 to aid Russia passed the House of Representatives and came to the Senate, and when the bill was pending in the Senate on the 20th of this month I spoke as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I listened to the speeches to-day, and they have all been excellent, varying emotions surged within me. Some Senators say this measure, if enacted into law, would not be constitutional, but the bill is institutional.

I sometimes believe that chloroform or some other anesthetic falls upon us in this Capitol, else what could make us so oblivious to what is going on in our own country as well as in other countries. Mr. President, during the past 10 years we have seen some strange mutations. In that decade changes more remarkable and radical took place on this earth than took place in the 200 years preceding. Even the processes of thought, the customs and views of the peoples, have changed, and whether we would or would not prefer the old days that we knew before 1914, we could not return to such standards if we tried.

We are living in a new earth and must adjust ourselves to the conditions.

We are told that thousands of people are starving in Russia. Doubtless that is true. We are told that we are inhibited by the Constitution from appropriating money for the purpose proposed. Doubtless that would be true according to the way the Constitution was interpreted, and correctly interpreted, 45 or 50 years ago; but the Constitution, sir, is not a dead hand; it is flexible. It has been stretched to protect every dollar in our land, and I insist that it shall be stretched to protect every person in our land.

Mr. President, we will find refuge to-day from the upbraidings of our national conscience by voting $20,000,000 to relieve Russia; but I fear when we examine closely we may find in that act but a scant refuge for our conscience.

The United States is a fountain, not a cistern; her open hand is a horn of plenty. The United States must and will take her place as the leader of the nations. Destiny compels her, requires her, to take that wondrous place. It is right and proper to listen to Russia's cry of anguish and despair, but before America can be generous, Mr. President, she must be just.

A Chinese philosopher once sent for his students to gather about him and tell him which, in their opinion, was the greatest of the virtues; he found them divided as to whether generosity or justice was the greater. The other virtues had comparatively no votes when the students were delivering their opinion. There was a tie vote between generosity and justice, and, breaking the tie, he said to them, "You must be just before you are generous. You can not be generous without first being just."

I believe that America as the leader of all the nations has come at last to know that there is an ethnic unity of the human race and that the distress of one nation must be a concern of all the others.

Now, let us examine and see if we have been just toward those whose sacrifices have made our country so powerful for good in the affairs of men.

How cynical, how tragic it would be to appropriate $20,000,000 for starving Russians and then refuse to appropriate the modest and much needed sum of $100,000 to aid the Department of Labor in securing employment for our unemployed men. Workingmen in America are not asking a largess or a gift from the Treasury; they are pleading for an opportunity to get a job and earn their bread. So I shall offer to this bill an amendment which passed the Senate on the 12th instant, and which amendment Senate conferees manfully struggled to save, same being an amendment appropriating $100,000 to be used by the Secretary of Labor in securing employment for the unemployed here in the United States.

Moreover, Mr. President, how may we lay the flattering unction to our souls, how can we say on Christmas Day, "We have done a glorious thing by sending $20,000,000 to Russia," when we remember that ex-service men are suffering from tuberculosis, and in many, too many, cases are without help or mercy.

The Senate on the 12th instant agreed to my amendment appropriating $1,000,000 for the further hospitalization of ex-service men afflicted with tuberculosis, yet that amendment, which was added to the deficiency bill, was abandoned in conference. The blame, however, does not rest upon the Senate, for this body did all within its power to save the amendment.

If we desire to serve America, if we want to keep her in the paths of progress, let us not neglect those who made possible our peace and our progress.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is not known as an orator, who makes no pretensions to oratory, really established himself to-day as an orator by his speech. In clear, convincing language he pointed out what destiny has cast upon us as to our duty to aid Russia; but are we going to say when the Christmas bells are ringing that we have $20,000,000 for Russia, but not a penny to aid the America workingman in securing a position; that we have money for Russia, but that the American soldier who carried our stainless banner to new glory may die a death of neglect because, forsooth, bureaucracy says the soldier is already taken care of, and that a bureaucracy must never be questioned?

Mr. President, German gas and German bullets slew their thousands of our boys and American red tape is slaying its thousands more. On the 2d day of November I laid before the Senate the facts as to the necessity of further hospitalization of soldiers afflicted with tuberculosis, who are pouring into the Southwest by the score. The local authorities have gone to their limit in trying to aid. The humanitarian and the generous people of the Southwest have given from their private purses until they are practically no longer able to give; and yet, inert, somnolent, bound by red tape, we serenely sit here while these poor boys are shamefully neglected. We are told by bureaucracy, which worships red tape, that "we are taking care of them." Ask the dying boys if they are being taken care of. Do not ask some bureaucrat. * * *

It has been stated here that if this bill does not become a law, children in Russia will perish. That is true, and I say if my amendment does not become a law, American citizens will perish here. The despondent, the disconsolate, who are out of money and out of work, looking not for charity, gifts, or a largess, but looking for work, will perish in spirit if not in body. No appropriation that could be made, nothing that could be done, would be more welcome to the people of this country than an appropriation to enable the Department of Labor to secure, if possible, positions and jobs for the unemployed.

I have said before, and I repeat, that if this amendment is defeated, if the hand of the Department of Labor shall be paralyzed in its laudable endeavor to secure work for men in order that they may earn their daily bread, the blame will not be on the Senate.

Mark you closely to what I now say. This Government does not owe anyone a living; he who being able to work says that the Government owes him a living is the idler, the malingerer, and the grafter; but the Government does owe every person a chance to earn a decent living, and the Government that does not secure to each citizen a fair chance to earn a living will soon drift into troubled waters.

I shall at the appropriate time offer another amendment—somewhat similar to the amendment I offered to the deficiency bill, which amendment was adopted by the Senate but lost in the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses—appropriating a reasonable sum of money to be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury to enable him to extend full hospitalization to ex-service men; then when these two amendments shall have been adopted and the bill passed we shall feel the glowing and expanding of soul that comes to those who have done their full duty.

I then proposed the following amendments to the bill, and both were agreed to by the Senate, viz:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. The location and nature of such hospitals, whether for the treatment of tuberculous, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

That for carrying into effect this provision relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

To enable the Secretary of Labor, during the present unemployment emergency, to augment the existing facilities of the United States Employment Service in facilitating the transportation of labor from one State to another, inform States in which there is scarcity of labor of the situation in States where there is surplus of labor of the kind desired, and securing, compiling, and publishing information on unemployment throughout the country, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official station, together with their per diem in lieu of subsistence, allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; rent of quarters outside of the District of Columbia; supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and printing and binding, $100,000.

Both of these amendments went to conference, and when the conference report was laid before us, we found that the Senate conferees had yielded to the House conferees and had receded, which action, of course, kills the two Senate amendments and leaves the bill precisely as it passed the House, to wit, $20,000,000 for relief of distressed Russians; not a penny for relief of distressed Americans. I believe, however, that the House conferees would have yielded had it been possible for them to do so without killing the Russian relief bill.

Now whilst Congress was appropriating $20,000,000 to aid sufferers in Russia what was going on at home?

I will read some of the melancholy happenings, and will call upon the Senators from the State mentioned in the dispatch I am now about to read to deny it if it be untrue. This is from the Washington Times of December 21, 1921. The article reads:

STARVATION IS FACING 2,000 IN WEST VIRGINIA TOWNSHIP—MINDEN PAINTED "HELL ON EARTH" AS RESULT OF MINE SHUTDOWN.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., December 21.

Two thousand men, women, and children, comprising the populace of a West Virginia town—Minden, in Fayette County—are literally starving to death.

The mines closed down several months ago. The miners and their families remained, hoping for a resumption of work. None came. To-day at Minden and other towns in the stricken area babies are dying for want of sufficient nourishment, children are half clothed, and the entire town is slowly starving.

To add to the misery, an influenza epidemic is sweeping the territory. The death rate has been alarming. Schools have closed; out of 500 pupils only 104 were able to attend classes last week.

Conditions in Minden and surrounding mining communities are deplorable. The babies cling to gaunt parents, weakened by weeks of literal starvation. An eyewitness arriving here last night said that a loaf of bread would be hailed as a gift from Heaven.

Where only one pair of wearable shoes are left in a family the children take turns in wearing them. The majority are walking about barefooted and shivering in the biting cold.

The mines shut down in early fall. Lack of orders was the cause. Five hundred miners were thrown out of employment. During the warmer weather of autumn there was no serious suffering, but when cold came, lack of food, clothing, and medical attention brought about pitiful conditions. One man from the stricken area, who managed to secure money enough to reach here, said that Minden was "a hell on earth" and had been for several weeks.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, is the Senator from Arizona able to state in what county Minden is?

Mr. ASHURST. Fayette County. That is a little more definite than "Volga Basin," in Russia.

There is no Senator here who could truthfully say that I have been more partisan than the exigencies of politics required me to be, and surely I do not desire to be offensively partisan on this occasion, but I can not forego the observation that it is the Republican and not the Democratic Party that needs sympathy now.

Your predicament is worse than ours. Politically, you are more nearly bankrupt of vision than we are, and your political situation, instead of improving, is rapidly growing worse.

When Republican Senators go to the cloakroom they will say, "That man is telling the truth." You may, and doubtless do, at times desire to solve these questions of large import, but you do not know how to go about it. Frequently, when your hands grasp the handle of the keen and glittering blade of truth and justice, you are inept and in your struggles to cut some Gordian knot you but slash and mutilate yourselves.

Never again let me see the word "efficiency" in a Republican editorial in praise of your present majority or hear it from the lips of a Republican orator. Do not use that word again. You have demonstrated your gross inefficiency and debility at a time when you had full power. I do not mean anything personal; I simply say that your own newspapers, your own orators, know that you are not meeting the duties of the hour.

True, you have passed some good legislation, but its volume is so small when compared to what you ought to have done that it is practically nothing. So, if you will pardon this political reference, you have now an opportunity golden in its preciousness, if you can only measure up to it, and I appeal to you to look into this need of the ex-soldier for hospitalization and see to it that the ex-soldiers who are suffering and who are unable to work by reason of disease shall be hospitalized.

So, to recapitulate, the Senate on the 20th instant adopted my amendment appropriating $100,000 to enable the Department of Labor to find work for unemployed men; on the same day it adopted my amendment appropriating $500,000 for the further hospitalization of soldiers wherever and whenever the Secretary of the Treasury desired to hospitalize them.

These amendments have been defeated, and the Russian relief bill will become a law. I again thank the Senate conferees for the time they gave me. Moreover, I would be playing a small part if I should criticize the House conferees, for I am sure they would have adhered to my amendments were it not almost a certainty that to so adhere would have killed the Russian relief bill.

I am not permitted to criticize the House of Representatives. I am not going to do so. Any criticism of the rules of that branch of Congress would be unparliamentary, howsoever true it might be. But I will say that when the gathering tide of public opinion is informed as to the archaic rules in another branch of the Congress, which make it practically impossible to secure needful legislation, there will come a demand that such rules shall be altered.

We have seen some strange mutations in politics in the past decade and we will see more unless we learn to do the people's will. In 1912 we thought the day of the Republican Party was done. We thought its blood was water. In 1920 there were men who thought the Democratic Party was dead. Neither party is dead. Unless adequate hospitalization for the tubercular ex-service men shall be provided I am going to leave here for a time and make some speeches in the States and in the districts of men who may solicit the votes of the people, and when I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which tells the tale of the inattention to and the disregard of amendments looking toward soldier relief somebody is going to "sit up and take notice."

It is a foul injustice which this Congress has perpetrated upon the Nation in defeating my amendments to the Russian relief bill.

When the conference report on the deficiency bill was before the Senate my learned friend from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] arose and castigated his party associates for their remissness. He said, "Why is it that bad measures always pass and good ones are defeated?" His phrase was, "Why is it that on all good amendments conferees always recede and on all bad amendments conferees agree?"

When he uttered these words little did we think that such a thing would happen again within a week, but it has happened. But, Mr. President, I am comforted by the reflection that—

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again; the eternal years of God are hers.

Congress may learn a valuable lesson from one of Joseph Addison's Essays entitled "The Political Upholsterer." There lived in London some years ago, within my neighborhood, says Addison, an upholsterer of more than ordinary diligence and application to business, and he became a man of independent means because of his close attention to his own affairs. He arose early; his family was decently provided for and his house was comfortable. Later he developed a peculiar habit of knitting his brows and his countenance grew grave; he arose at a still earlier hour, not, however, to open his shop, but to inquire if the mail from Holland had yet arrived.

He became more inquisitive to know what went on in Poland than what took place in his own household, and he was in greater anxiety for King Augustus's welfare than for the welfare of his own family.

This man and his affairs had long been out of my mind, continues Addison, until about three days ago, when I met him walking in St. James Park. He was shabbily dressed, and I intended to ask him as to his present circumstances when he prevented me from doing so by asking me what I sincerely thought of the King of Sweden? When he had fully discussed Turkey in Europe and had deposed princes, settled the bounds of kingdoms, and balanced the power of Europe, he asked me to lend him half a crown, for in his upholstering of foreign countries he had ruined his business, reduced his family to poverty and himself to beggary. Addison says he loaned the half crown to the worthy but needy "statesmen," to be repaid when the Turk was driven out of Constantinople.

Mr. President, we are neglecting our own household whilst upholstering foreign countries; the course of conduct which ruined the London upholsterer will, if practiced much further, ruin the United States. Let us first be just to those at home who have claims upon us; then our generosity toward strangers will be a virtue. As it is now our generosity to strangers whilst our own are in need is our reproach.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in the Washington Post of today there is an article containing the information that a bill was introduced on yesterday in the House of Representatives which imposes a penalty of $5,000 upon any Member of either branch of Congress for joining what is called a "bloc" to procure or defeat legislation. The bill was introduced by Mr. ANSORGE, a Republican, from the city of New York.

A great deal has been said recently about an agricultural bloc in the Senate. I was one of the first men to suggest this cooperation between the Democrats of the South and the Republicans of the West. I suggested it for the purpose of securing much-needed legislation. The South and the West were afflicted alike. Agriculture was stricken down in both sections by the deadly deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. We could not obtain money to carry on our business.

The merchants and bankers of the agricultural South and the agricultural West were in identically the same condition. The Federal Reserve Board had closed the door in their faces and the farmer was stricken down, prone upon the ground, utterly helpless in his great distress. We desired to do something to give relief to him.

We complained that this board's policy was injuriously affecting these two sections, but the President did not seem to understand or to be moved by our pleas, and we could not get relief through the Federal reserve system because of a tyrannical Federal Reserve Board, which controlled the money supply and credit of the country. Agriculture, I repeat, under the withering, blighting, deadly touch of the Federal Reserve Board, was stricken down and almost destroyed.

We sought to revive the War Finance Corporation. Eastern Senators were against us. Wall Street's power and influence were felt in opposition to that legislation.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator may recall that, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Senate, I made a tour of the West and South at a time when the subject of the revival of the War Finance Corporation was under consideration. I met the Senator in his own State in the city of Birmingham. I made a trip through the South and the West with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. After I had gone a little way from New York I discovered the need of the revival of the War Finance Corporation. I venture the statement that no man in this body did more to bring about the resumption of that organization than did I, and I am a Senator from New York and reside in the great metropolis.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that. I did see him at Birmingham, and I traveled on the train with him, and he was interested in the revival of the War Finance Corporation, and did aid. But, Mr. President, he was just one. We had to have votes enough here to put the measure through. I praise and commend the Senator for the part that he played.

But should we southern Democrats and western Republicans be condemned for uniting our forces to relieve a distressing condition? That is what we were seeking to do. We held conferences and we said at those meetings that there was no politics in them and should not be. I said, "Our section is suffering as your section is," and others said the same thing. "Why not come together and extend the hand of help to these sections—the South and the West?" We did that, and but for that combination of power in this body the War Finance Corporation would never have been revived.

Now, Mr. President, Wall Street is interested in killing any legislation that will make money matters easy in any section of the country, because Wall Street wants to return to the time, and it is just about here, when it can control the money supply and credits of 100,000,000 people.

Mr. President, since we revived the War Finance Corporation and since we amended the act, I believe in August, we have made loans to the extent of $118,000,000. Now, that has helped some; it has helped a great deal. Translated up through the system, probably it will amount to $400,000,000 or $500,000,000. Good has been accomplished by it.

Not long ago the New York Journal of Commerce leveled a very bitter criticism against the president of the American Cotton Association, Hon. J. S. Wannamaker, an honored citizen of South Carolina, a great American patriot, and a man of unimpeachable integrity. The New York Journal of Commerce charges that he carried on a propaganda for the purpose of deceiving the public and deceiving the Agricultural Department as to the statistical position of cotton and as to the acreage to be planted for the year 1921. I denounce the attack as unwarranted and the article as untrue.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know how far-reaching its influence has been, but I know that the Department of Agriculture or somebody in it, I think the Bureau of Crop Estimates, recently intimated very strongly that misleading information had been given out by the cotton farmers of the United States. Has the time come in this administration when the South and the West are not to be consulted as to the correct agricultural situation in them, and is the New York Journal of Commerce to dictate the policy of the Department of Agriculture?

The New York Journal of Commerce assails the president of the American Cotton Association, and the Agricultural Department repeats, in substance, through its Crop Estimating Board, the very line of argument made by that journal. Let me call the attention of Senators to an article appearing in the New York Journal of Commerce. It reads:

The Journal of Commerce formerly received frequent press dispatches from him—

usually filed as press matter and offered prepaid. So long as they seemed rational and trustworthy they were used, generally with some condensation, but long ago their tone became so abusive of reputable textile leaders who disagreed with him, and his assertions were so palpably biased and absurd, that further dispatches were refused and he was forced to turn to other papers less discriminating in their columns.

Mr. President, I wonder if the day has come when we shall be unable to get legitimate information before the American people? I wonder if the big journals of our country will reach the point where they will refuse to take statements for publication which are sent out by men who represent organizations that affect from twenty-five to thirty millions of the American people, statements in which the public is interested? This newspaper admits that these items were sent in and were prepaid—they did not cost the newspaper one cent—giving information about the great American cotton crop, not a sectional crop, for it is the United States cotton crop and vitally affects the whole American people. It brings gold into our country when all other products fail, and in normal times gives us the balance of trade.

The President of the American Cotton Association sends out information about the acreage and about cotton generally, but the New York Journal of Commerce, because the president of the association criticized some textile man, some cotton manufacturer, ceased to publish any of these articles, threw them into the wastebasket, and says that he was compelled to turn to other sources to get his publications before the people. That is what we have come to, Mr. President. The New York Journal of Commerce criticizes the president of the American Cotton Association severely, mistreats him, says things about him that are unwarranted, and shows in its article that it is representing the gambling interests in cotton and certain spinners who want to hold the price of cotton down so low that they can buy it for almost nothing and after they get it into their hands permit the price to go to 25 or 30 cents, and then base the price of the finished product upon the high price reached in the spot-cotton market. That is what they will do. So the consumer will not be benefited and the producer will be impoverished. That is what will happen.

The New York Journal of Commerce makes this criticism, the Crop Estimating Board of the Agriculture Department reechoes it, and a Republican Member of Congress from New York City introduces a bill to impose a fine on a Senator from the South and a Senator from the West for meeting together and trying to secure legislation for the benefit of 60,000,000 of American people.

Oh, Mr. President, thank God the reckoning day is coming next year. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] spoke truly when he said the Republican majority is so large in both bodies that it seems to have gone to sleep. Some of these men have become so arrogant, so puffed up on a little brief authority, that they dare to demand legislation which proposes to put a fine upon a United States Senator for supporting legislation that will aid agriculture. My good friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], one of the leading spirits, one of the ablest and best of the "agricultural bloc," whose heart beats loyal to the man who toils, whether he lives in the South or the West, the North or the East, is to be fined $5,000 for trying to help a farmer in Iowa get a price for his corn, his oats, and his wheat that will cover the cost of production and yield him a living profit.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. KENYON. I have not had an opportunity to examine the remarkable bill to which the Senator from Alabama refers, but I ask is there any provision in it that a Member of Congress introducing any bill for the relief of agriculture shall be considered a criminal and fined?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not read the bill, but I shall look for the introduction of a bill like that.

Mr. KENYON. A bill of that character could not be quite complete unless it contained such a provision.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator from Iowa for his suggestion. I shall not be surprised any morning now to wake up and find that a bill has been introduced to impose a penalty upon a Senator from the South or the West who introduces a bill to give relief to agriculture in any form. Oh, Mr. President, little by little and bit by bit under Republican rule they are crowding out the small man, the man of moderate means, the common mass of the people.

There is now in existence a Joint Committee on Agricultural Inquiry, composed of Senators and Members of the House, to inquire into the relations of banking to agriculture, and so forth. A majority of that committee are composed of Republicans. Mr. OGDEN L. MILLS, of New York City, a brilliant young lawyer, and, as I understand, is the son of a brilliant lawyer who is the attorney for the J. Pierpont Morgan banking interests, is a member of that joint committee. I have not objected because he is a member of it. I should like to have the banking interests represented by somebody; I think all interests ought to be represented by men who are competent and honest. No man from the agricultural sections went to the Speaker of the House or to anybody else to ask that this man be taken off; but he is on that joint committee.

Now, where is this man ANSORGE who introduced a bill to fine us for cooperating in the interests of agriculture? We did not hear any complaint from him about putting a man like that on that joint committee, a man who is going to have a vote as to whether or not the Federal Reserve Board shall be whitewashed or whether its conduct shall be condemned.

Mr. President, the agricultural organizations of the South have denounced the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board; the agricultural and cattle interests of the West have denounced it; the farmer organizations of these sections who constitute nearly 60,000,000 of the American population have denounced it. Now, we will see in a few days when the report comes in whether Wall Street is going to triumph or whether the expressions of the American people regarding the maladministration of this system shall be made known in that report.

Mr. President, I am supporting now a measure pending before the Senate designed to place a practical farmer on the Federal Reserve Board. I made a short speech the other day in favor of that measure. I heard a speech made on the other side by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a banker, a distinguished Republican, and chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, protesting against such a step and warning us of the danger of such a precedent.

Oh, Mr. President, I never hear the question of constitutionality raised until some measure is offered here for the benefit of the masses; I never hear the point made that a measure is unconstitutional when special interests are to be benefited; but if it comes to a measure that will benefit the common mass, or the great agricultural class, which is now down and out in America, it is unconstitutional; it is wrong; it will establish a bad precedent. While the Senator from Connecticut was speaking I thought of the provision in the law as it now stands that out of the seven members of the Federal Reserve Board two shall be bankers. Nobody ever made the point that that was unconstitutional; that that was class legislation; but that is in the law. The fact is nearly all of the members of the board are bankers, I do not care what they call themselves.

I am willing for the banking interest to be represented on that board. I am going to repeat here what I said the other day, that the best thing President Harding could do would be to clean out the Federal Reserve Board. If he wants to make the American people a Christmas gift that will be appreciated and applauded, there is no Christmas gift that the President could make to the people that would be more highly appreciated and more warmly applauded than the announcement on Christmas morning that he had cleaned out the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, when a board like that will sit and do the bidding of Wall Street and strike down the great agricultural industry of America and contribute to the hard times through which we are now passing and which are proving so embarrassing all over the Nation, it ought to be cleaned out, for to continue it in power is wrong.

Mr. President, I want to call attention now to an article on that matter of putting a farmer on this board. I am going to insist upon putting a practical farmer on that board, and my judgment is that that bill will pass. I should like to see the Senator who will vote against it. I should like to see the Senator who has farmers in his State who will stand up before them when they ask him:

"Do you represent the people of this State?"

"Yes, sir."

"How many members of the Federal Reserve Board are there?"

"Seven."

"The agricultural interest of the United States is pretty large, is it not?"

"Yes."

"Agriculture is said to be the corner stone of all other industries, is it not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Without it, all the others would fall, would it not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then the men who toil to produce that which feeds and clothes the world are entitled to a fair chance in the struggle for existence, are they not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then when they are driven by distress to call upon the Federal Reserve banking system for money or credit ought they not to have a friend at court to present their case, and if they are turned down to go to the President and acquaint him with the truth of the situation?"

And imagine the Senator saying:

"No, sir; I do not think so."

What do you suppose the farmers of that State would do to him? They would do to him what they ought to do—vote against him.

So I dare say, now, that that bill will pass this body, providing that when the next vacancy occurs on the Federal Reserve Board the President shall appoint a practical farmer to that position—one out of seven. Who can deny that these millions of American farmers are entitled to one man upon that board? Mr. President, we want a man on that board, when these applications are made for money or credit, who will let us know the reason why they are turned down. We are entitled to demand that.

I hold in my hand an article sent out from Washington on December 19. It is about this proposal for a farmer member on the Federal Reserve Board, and it closes by saying:

That it will not pass Congress is the general prediction.

I do not know where this newspaper man got his information, but I do not think he is speaking for the Members of this body. I believe we will get two-thirds of the Members of this body for that measure. I hate to have it postponed even temporarily, because I believed that a propaganda would be carried on, and I think it is being carried on now. I expect to see Wall Street use every influence it has to beat this proposition, but I do not believe it will succeed. If it does succeed, then a woeful and calamitous time has come upon us, and God speed the day when there can be a reckoning at the judgment bar of the American people!

We ask only what is right and just and fair. We have not hidden our light under a bushel. We have come out in the open. We have met together in council. When did it become a violation of the law for the representatives of the American people to come together and talk over their troubles and suggest ways and means to relieve this section and that, and then agree to get behind a measure because it is right and just and pass it through the Senate? When did that become a crime?

Some people have cried out against it. Even a Cabinet officer assailed it. The New York Journal of Commerce attacks it, and a Republican Member of Congress has introduced a bill to make it a misdemeanor to unite our forces to bring about just remedial legislation for the great agricultural interests of America. Mr. President, verily we have fallen upon strange times!

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word.

I opposed putting the amendments of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] on this bill, not because I was opposed to the amendments, but because I did not think this measure ought to be delayed in any way by putting on matters that really were not connected with it, or, at least, not directly so.

I was one of the members of the conference committee. I did not agree to the recession from these amendments until I became absolutely convinced that if we did not recede from them the bill would not pass, or, at least, would not pass before the recess. I was not willing to see the bill fail on that account, much as I regretted the elimination of the amendments of the Senator from Arizona.

It was only because of that situation that I joined in the conference report receding from these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on H. R. 9548.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope if there is any more morning business that it may be concluded. I should like to state that after the morning business is over several Senators want to take up bills by unanimous consent, and several Senators desire to speak. I think all will be given plenty of opportunity if we can proceed in the regular order.

CONDITION OF SUPREME COURT DOCKET.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

The reading clerk read Senate resolution 198, submitted by Mr. TRAMMELL on the 20th instant, requesting the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to direct the clerk of the Supreme Court to furnish to the Senate certain information.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the resolution had better go over, as the Senator from Florida is not here.

Mr. NELSON. I move that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator had better wait until the Senator from Florida comes in.

Mr. NELSON. Let it go over until his return, then.

Mr. TRAMMELL subsequently said: Mr. President, the resolution that I have offered, calling for certain information relative to the status of the docket of the Supreme Court, has, I believe, been reached in regular order; but at the request of a number of Senators, feeling that the delay would not be of any detriment, it is agreeable to me for the resolution to go over until we reconvene after the holidays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over without prejudice.

OFFICERS OF NAVAL AIR SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day.

The reading clerk read Senate resolution 200, submitted by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts on the 20th instant, as follows:

Whereas extensive publicity has been given to examinations recently required of officers of the Naval Air Service holding temporary commissions and members of the Naval Reserve Flying Corps desiring to transfer to permanent ranks in the Navy;

Whereas it has been publicly charged that such examinations were unfair and unreasonable, that an insufficient opportunity for preparation was afforded, that the greater portion of such examinations was devoted to navigation, steam engineering, seamanship, and other subjects wholly unrelated to aviation, and that the individual ability of the officer or member was not given proper consideration;

Whereas it has been stated that as a result of such examinations many of the successful candidates were reduced in rank and a very large per cent of the candidates were declared unqualified for permanent commissions; and

Whereas unless some action is taken the United States will lose the services of approximately 200 trained and experienced aviators, including the most experienced and skilled pilots in the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, by subcommittee or otherwise, is authorized and directed to investigate the transfer and the examinations held in connection with the transfer of such officers and members, under the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1920, and to hold public hearings during the recesses or sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, at such times and places as it may deem advisable, in order to determine the correctness of such charges and statements, to make recommendations to the Secretary of the Navy, and to report to the Senate the findings and recommendations.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

Mr. KING. May I inquire if the Senator from Massachusetts desires it to go over?

Mr. CURTIS. He is not here.

Mr. KING. I ask that it lie on the table until his return.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate resolution 200, which was introduced by me yesterday and reached a short time ago during my absence from the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Has the Senator from Massachusetts talked with the members of the Naval Affairs Committee about this resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have consulted with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who is very sympathetic with the resolution and who stated that if he was present he would support it. I also talked with the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, who is not opposed to it.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss at length this resolution. Briefly, it seeks to submit to the Naval Affairs Committee or a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee the question of the fairness of certain examinations given to reserve officers of the Naval Flying Corps.

Last May 244 reserve officers in the Naval Air Service took an examination for permanent commissions. These young men left the colleges of the country to enlist in the service during the early days of the war, and took all the risks and encountered all the dangers of aviation service. They were led to believe and expected that if they made a good record they would, after the war, be given permanent rank. The examinations to which they submitted were largely of subjects relating to navigation, though they had no experience at sea. The result was that an exceedingly large number of them failed, and a large number of those who succeeded in the examinations were reduced in rank. These young men claim that the examination was unfair and unreasonable under all the circumstances. They feel that the Government that they tried to serve faithfully and without consideration of personal comforts or danger to limb and life has not shown proper appreciation.

When the reserve officers in the flying corps of the Army were being selected for permanent posts an examination in aviation subjects was given them. When the reserve officers in the flying corps of the Marine Service were given examinations they also were given examinations chiefly in aviation subjects. The reserve officers in the flying corps of the Navy alone had to submit to an examination chiefly in general navigation, rather than in aviation. The result has led to a great deal of dissatisfaction; and it seems to me that an impartial inquiry by the committee or a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs will perhaps lead to a recommendation being made that will lead to the holding of another examination, the rerating of those who had been reduced in rank, or at least in removing in part the dissatisfaction that now exists.

The result of the examination, unless some change of policy is adopted, means the loss to the service of many excellent aviators who have been trained at great expense to the Government. It is estimated that during the war it cost $40,000 to train a naval aviator. This loss to the Navy can not be duplicated in time of peace.

I am further informed that little, if any, consideration was given to the skill, experience, or special training in aviation of the individuals by the examination held.

Among those who failed in the examination were many of the best pilots in the service, nearly all of the instructors at the various air stations, commanding officers of large air stations, and pilots who made splendid records under enemy fire during the war.

It is to find out whether an injustice has been done these men that I ask for this inquiry. Surely after four or five years of faithful service of a most hazardous character we ought to hesitate about rejecting these men, compelling them to take up new careers after giving their best years to their country. I urge the passage of the resolution, and will not further discuss this matter to-day, as I know the Senate is anxious to adjourn early.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY LAW.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 6998, being Order of Business 355, which modifies the national bankruptcy act by adding to the debts not affected by a discharge the following subdivisions:

(Fifth) Are for wages due to workmen, clerks, traveling or city salesmen, or servants, which have been earned within three months before the date of commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (sixth) are due for moneys of an employee received or retained by his employer to secure the faithful performance by such employee of the terms of a contract of employment.

This is a House bill, having passed the House some time ago, and having been reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. The language which I have read so plainly states the purpose of the bill that unless some Senator desires to discuss it, I am ready to submit it to the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. R. 6998. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6998) to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. NELSON. There is one amendment in the bill to correct an omission that was made in the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 6, before the word "further," to insert "and hereby is"; on line 7, after the word "amended," to insert "so as"; and on page 2, line 4, after the word "representations," to insert "or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 17 of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917, be, and hereby is, further amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. Debts not affected by a discharge: A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are liabilities for obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, or for alimony due or to become due, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for breach of promise of marriage accompanied by seduction, or for criminal conversation; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor, if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity; or (5) are for wages due to workmen, clerks, traveling or city salesmen, or servants, which have been earned within three months before the date of commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (6) are due for moneys of an employee received or retained by his employer to secure the faithful performance by such employee of the terms of a contract of employment."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOMS BUILDINGS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 6557, being Order of Business 372. It is a bill which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to rebuild and repair, as may be necessary, the public buildings at San Juan, Porto Rico, they having lapsed into a state of collapse or partial collapse, so that their rebuilding is really necessary at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 6557. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6557) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto Rico, and to pay for same out of duties collected in Porto Rico, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to repair and rebuild, as may be necessary, the buildings in Porto Rico acquired by the United States under article 8 of the treaty of April 11, 1899, between the United States and Spain (30 Stats., p. 1758), and reserved for customs purposes by the proclamation of the President of June 30, 1903, and to pay for the cost of such repairs and rebuilding, not to exceed $200,000, out of the duties collected in Porto Rico as an expense of collection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator how it is, in view of the fact that no other public-buildings bills have been reported, either for the purpose of purchasing ground or constructing new buildings or repairing old ones, that this measure has been reported.

Mr. NEW. Simply for the reason, Mr. President, that these buildings were very seriously impaired and partially destroyed by the earthquake of 1918. They were patched up as well as they could be at the time, but the temporary repairs have served their usefulness and the buildings are untenantable unless they can be repaired now. The Secretary of the Treasury has asked for authority to make the repairs out of the Porto Rican funds at an expense not to exceed $200,000.

Mr. KING. Would that course be approved by the people of Porto Rico?

Mr. NEW. I understand that it would be. They have asked it.

Mr. KING. As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, when we deal with our insular possessions or with territories, the wishes of the people there ought to be considered rather than our wishes.

Mr. NEW. This is in entire consonance with their wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIP A. HERTZ.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1542, for the relief of Philip A. Hertz. This is a bill to correct the military record of this soldier, who enlisted in the Army of the United States during the Civil War, in 1861, as a drummer boy, when he was 14 years of age. He served for three years, and at the end of that three years he reenlisted as a private soldier. In 1864 he was very badly wounded, after having served over three years and a half. He was sent to the hospital, where he remained for two months, then was furloughed home, where, the record shows, he continued ill and he failed to report again before the end of the war. He is now a man 75 years of age. As I said a moment ago, he served actively three years and a half, was badly wounded, and this bill is simply designed to correct his record as of the date of its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 1542. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was rejected.

ACQUISITION OF REAL ESTATE BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7158, to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from New York briefly explain the bill. I have not had time to read the report on it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I realize that this bill is not without importance. It is a House measure, passed several months ago by the House after very extensive hearings before the House Committee on Military Affairs.

Senators will, of course, recall that during the war the War Department acquired a large number of valuable tracts of land, either by lease or by purchase outright, or, in many cases, by condemnation proceedings, and upon those lands were built large numbers of buildings, some of them at great cost.

As soon as the war was over, shortly after the armistice, Congress, in the Army appropriation bill of 1919, forbade the War Department purchasing another acre of land or putting up another building. The action of the Congress at that time, in my judgment, was entirely warranted, for there was certainly a disposition on the part of the War Department to go ahead in purchasing more land and in some cases doing it in a rather reckless manner. The Congress interposed with an objection and said, "You shall not buy another acre or put up another building until we give you specific permission to do so." I think that action was warranted, and, under the circumstances, was in the interest of the Treasury and the taxpayers.

The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate reported that provision in the Army appropriation bill. At the time we did so and at the time the House Military Affairs Committee did so we knew full well that in many instances grave hardships would be imposed upon citizens of the United States whose property had been condemned, but who had not been paid; upon other citizens whose property had been leased by the Government with the agreement to purchase at a later date pending negotiations. We also knew that upon much of this land great buildings had been erected, the property of the Government.

It turns out that in some of these war-time installations, especially the ones recited in this bill, the Government owns outright the great majority of the land in the project, but has failed to acquire title, for one reason or another, and especially by reason of the enactment of 1919, to small parcels of land within the project, and in all of these instances the Government has put up immensely expensive buildings on land which it does not own.

In some instances the Government wants to sell the entire project, get the money, put it back into the Federal Treasury, and get out of the project. It can not do so, because it has not the title to some of these small parcels upon which Government buildings have been built. The value of the buildings is vastly more than the value of the land.

The House committee, after extended hearings, went over these different projects and reported this bill, and the House passed it, and I think I may say with entire accuracy that the House has been exceedingly careful, in matters of this kind, in preventing the War Department from indulging in any extravagance.

While this bill does carry appropriations amounting to four millions and a few hundred thousand dollars, if it passes it will enable the War Department to get rid of a lot of this property, and put back into the Federal Treasury much more than $4,000,000. As it is to-day, the department is helpless in the matter. It can not move. In several instances it has these buildings on land which it does not own. In the projects named this bill permits the War Department to complete title, as it were, to the remaining parcels, and in that way enable it to do business with people who will come forward, and have already come forward, in some instances, with proposals to purchase.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice in the report the item of the Savanna proving ground, Savanna, Ill. The investment in the land is given as $900,000, and the improvements on that land $4,986,503. Is that the price of the land agreed upon during war time, a war price?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President, that refers to land which has already been paid for. That is a typical example.

Mr. SMOOT. Take, for instance, the Army base at Charleston, S. C. An appropriation is asked in that case of $159,020.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is for the land, while the improvements on that land are estimated at $16,500,000. I desire to know, is the $159,020 the price of the land at a time when lands were higher than they are to-day, a war price? Was there any agreement as to that amount, or is that the agreement as to the value of the land to-day?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the estimate of the amount which the department will need to acquire the land. I think if the Senator will look up the records he will find that so long did the War Department postpone, or so long was it compelled to postpone, settlement with the owners that the owners sued in the Federal courts in South Carolina and recovered a big judgment against the Government.

This land was requisitioned in April, 1918, but was not paid for, and under the act of Congress of 1919 it could not be paid for. The land amounts to 1,533 acres. The amount asked is $159,000, about $100 an acre. The Government has spent in permanent improvements $16,500,000. It is a big Army base, up the river from Charleston, S. C., with docks and warehouses. The Government can not get rid of it. Personally I think the Government should sell it, or lease it and get some revenue from it, for it can not be used by the Army to-day for any active purpose, but the Government can not do anything with it until it gets title to that land.

Mr. SMOOT. The only object of my inquiry was to find out whether the price the Government is to pay, as stated in this report, is the price that was agreed upon before the Government put any improvements on that land.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think there was no agreement; it was simply taken.

Mr. SMOOT. They did not try to agree about any price?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may have done so; I do not know as to that; but a judgment was rendered against the Government in Charleston.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, with the Senator from New York, that this is the only way we will ever get our money out of many of these improvements. In other words, the value of the land in all of these improvements taken together is $4,140,105.72, and the Government of the United States has put improvements on that very land to the extent of $131,000,000. The total value of the land involved is $4,140,105.72. That is what this bill would appropriate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that land the Government has already expended, by way of improvement, $131,589,131.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, it is fair to say that those improvements were put on at war-time prices, but even making allowance for the reduction in their value, it is easy to see that the improvements are worth infinitely more than the land. The improvements are useless to the Government, in the matter of getting rid of them or using them actively on a permanent basis until the Government owns the land under them. I think the War Department is not entirely out of sympathy with my view and that of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and if I had my way about it, as soon as I got title to the entire tracts of land which underlie these great installations I would sell most of them and stop maintaining them and adding to the overhead cost of the Army.

The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will bear me out in the statement that I have been somewhat of a crank in inveighing against the terrific cost of the Army, not the cost of officers and soldiers but the cost of maintaining and guarding against fire, thievery, and damage to these huge war-time installations, the size of which surpasses my powers of description. Some of them are so large it is difficult to conceive how they were built in such a short time, but they are there.

Mr. KING. Or why they were built.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were built for a three years' war.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there is a camp in North Carolina where the land was seized by the Government and the people driven out from their homes. Schoolhouses were taken, churches were taken, and the people have gone. They refused to sell the land, so the Government took it, and many suits have been filed in the courts to ascertain what those lands are worth. Judgment has been rendered for the value of the land. I do not see that the bill mentions any of those people. They ought to be included, because the Government will have to pay the amount if judgment is rendered against the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a direct appropriation for specific amounts and specific purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are in exactly the same situation. Does the Senator object to having Camp Bragg included?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would hesitate on behalf of the committee to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to have the bill go over so that we may confer with the Secretary of War, who has visited Camp Bragg, and I understand is going to maintain it. It is one of the main camps of the United States. I have no doubt he will make some recommendation, because judgment has just been rendered for the lands that were taken from these people, when the people were driven out from their homes and had to buy other lands, and they now want the money with which to pay for them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator will not delay passage of the bill. We can get just as quick action on the matter in which the Senator is interested if the bill is passed.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think the matter to which the Senator from North Carolina refers is quite cognate with this. This seeks an appropriation to pay for land which the Government has condemned or sought to condemn, and which it has kept. It desires to complete the purchase in order that it may acquire particular buildings.

The case referred to by the Senator from North Carolina is where the Government has taken over the land, already owns it, but has not paid the judgment of condemnation which has been awarded. That can be brought in as a separate measure; indeed, it ought to come upon a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It will naturally go upon such a bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not wish to delay the pending bill, but I desire to know from the Senator just what the situation is. These people did not want to sell their lands. They are Scotch and they love their old homes, but they were driven off the lands by the Government. Recently judgments have been rendered in favor of the people for their lands which were taken by the Government, and they want their money.

Mr. SMOOT. They ought to have it and no doubt will get it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Secretary of War wants to pay them, but I do not know whether he has any authority under this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; he has no authority under this bill. The bill was very carefully drawn by the House committee and is specific in its provisions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was it recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know he is in favor of paying the judgment to which I have referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the judgment to which the Senator refers was rendered since the preparation of the bill. There will be other matters of the kind presented.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the judgment was rendered about a month ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is simply a question of presenting the judgment to the proper committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that such matters are handled usually by the Appropriations Committee. However, I am not going to delay the consideration of the bill. I merely wanted information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York whether it would not be possible in some of these instances to sell the property which the Government owns, in part at least, subject to the defect in the title?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not believe the Government could get a very good price in any such deal as that. If the Government does not own the property, it is not in a position to do business with anybody who wants to buy it.

Mr. KING. The point I am trying to get at is this: Might not the individual who purchased from the Government make a better deal with the owners of the property than the Government itself? I observe as to many of the prices named in the bill that they are apparently extravagant. They seem to me to be enormous prices for wild, vacant, and unoccupied land—that is, unoccupied and vacant until the Government obtained possession of it for the purpose of erecting buildings upon a portion of it. A thousand dollars an acre for some of that wild land upon some of those streams in some of those districts is an extravagant price.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know of any thousand-dollar-an-acre land involved here that is in a wild country. There is some in the heart of business districts; for instance, there is one in the city of Brooklyn.

Mr. KING. I was referring to one in South Carolina, as I recall, which is a thousand dollars an acre.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it is $100 an acre.

Mr. KING. Then I was in error in my figures. The Senator, then, thinks it would be impossible for the Government to sell unless it acquires additional property?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; to sell at any advantage to the Government.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator assure us that the Government sympathizes with his view and will make such disposition?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it does in several of these instances, not at all. Some will be permanent. For example, there is one in Brooklyn which is an immense thing, the largest of its kind in the world, involving immense concrete and steel warehouses that have been put up on the water front. It is in the heart of the water-front district of Brooklyn.

Mr. KING. In the particular instance some of the land upon which the buildings have been constructed has not yet been acquired?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has not.

Mr. KING. The buildings were erected without acquiring title to the land?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. In that case the Government is leasing to private parties, I think, two of the piers and is getting a good revenue. As the great concrete storehouses are emptied out by the sale of surplus supplies they will be able to lease more facilities, and the Government has to settle with the owners of the land underneath the building some day. The quicker we get title to it the more free are we to do with it as we please.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that I had occasion to criticize the former Secretary of War and Chief of Staff and those in control of this branch of the War Department service because of their tenacity in holding on to a large number of these plants and warehouses and storehouses. Instead of selling them, as ought to have been done, they were holding on to them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They could not sell them while they did not own the land underneath.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is one question I should like to ask: Are the prices fixed in the bill the result of an agreement or the result of condemnation proceedings? For instance, let us take the case of the Army supply base, Brooklyn, N. Y., $1,590,000. Is that a price that has been agreed upon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the price which the War Department recommends as necessary to complete the purchase. May I call the Senator's attention to the figures in that connection?

Mr. NELSON. What I mean is whether the figures that are given here are the result of condemnation proceedings, or are they the result of agreements with the owners?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Both.

Mr. NELSON. Are there any of them as to which no agreements have been made and no condemnation proceedings had?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; there is one, and I was going to ask that that be stricken from the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Which one is that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the one relating to the quartermaster's warehouse at Baltimore, Md., that provision which authorizes the Secretary to sell to the Canton Co., of Baltimore, for $300,000 the improvements erected upon the site. I am going to ask that that be stricken from the bill. The Secretary informs me that he is now in negotiation with the owners of the land to get them to purchase the Government buildings, and he will be in position to get a better deal than that provided for by the House provision, and he wants that stricken from the bill. The Military Committee authorized me to offer that amendment.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from New York that the storehouse at Charleston is still being used by the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; for storage.

Mr. DIAL. They have a large quantity of material on hand there yet. Just a month or two ago I received a telegram in which I was informed that they had 160,000 bales of cotton in this house, and in addition to that they are using it for shipping purposes. It is being used largely, of course, for storage.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are using that for storage, as I happen to know.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I find in section 2 of the bill this provision:

That the Secretary of War is empowered to carry out agreements for the purchase of said real estate—

Referring to the items for which appropriation is made. Then in line 20 it is said:

and he is hereby authorized and directed to dismiss all actions pending in court for the condemnation of the following-described tracts of real estate.

Then follows a description of the tracts of land referred to. Then in section 3 it is provided:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, at the time of the expiration of the leases now held by the War Department, covering the several tracts of land heretofore described—

I take it that refers to those described in the preceding section?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I continue the reading—to enter into new contracts for the lease of such portions of said land as he deems necessary, and for such length of time as he deems advisable, to enable the War Department to remove all Government buildings and other property now located on said premises: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase from the owner or owners of such number of acres as in his judgment is necessary for the operation of the water plant now located thereon, or to lease the same for a term of years, as his judgment may direct.

Why should the Secretary of War desire to purchase land for a water plant if he is going to abandon those lands and remove the Government buildings from them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am glad the Senator called attention to those provisions. I intend to move to strike them all out. They all refer to Camp Grant, in Illinois. The House put them in. The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate is not quite aware of the reasons for putting them in. The provision authorizes the Secretary of War to dismiss all the actions pending in court for the condemnation of certain tracts inside of the Camp Grant reservation. They comprise but a comparatively small fraction of the entire tract, but on them stand the very center of the camp, the buildings themselves.

The Secretary of War has informed the committee that if he is compelled to dismiss all the actions pending in court he will have to move those buildings. He will have to move them to some other part of the camp, and that will cost a large sum of money. He desires an opportunity to acquire the title to the remaining parcels in the center of Camp Grant, and then to be free to deal as he pleases, with such authority as the Congress gives him, for the sale of the entire property or its retention in whole or in part. He points out in the letter, which has been made a part of the record, the disadvantage which will accrue to the Government if the action suggested by the House, in the language to which the Senator calls attention, is adopted. At the proper time it is my intention to offer as an amendment the striking out of all the provisions to which the Senator has alluded.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter from the Secretary of War relating to this matter. It is rather lengthy, but to my mind it puts up a perfectly good case for the striking out of the provisions, so the Government will be free to go ahead with that business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 5, 1921.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: I desire to call attention to certain amendments which have been added to H. R. 204, Union Calendar, No. 54, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session. This bill was originally introduced April 11, 1921, and was reported May 26, 1921, with amendments, committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. It is now H. R. 7158, Report No. 185, reported June 16, 1921.

The amendments to which attention is called are as follows:

(a) Lines 20 to 25, page 2, and lines 1 and 2, page 3, of H. R. 204, Report No. 102, which read as follows: "or the Secretary of War is authorized to sell to the Canton Co., of Baltimore, the improvements erected upon the site within 90 days from the enactment of this law for the sum of $300,000, plus interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on all deferred payments."

By this amendment the Secretary of War is authorized to sell to the Canton Co., of Baltimore, certain improvements which, however, are necessary for the proper functioning of the supply depot in Baltimore, and which should by all means be retained by the War Department. In the bill as originally presented by the War Department an appropriation of $100,000 was asked in order to complete the acquisition of the real estate necessary for this depot. It will be further noted that the cost to the Government in improvements pertaining to the Baltimore depot was $1,900,000, and it is therefore apparent that if the sale of these improvements for the sum of $300,000 is effected at this time and in the manner proposed, it will result in a very material loss to the Government.

"and he is hereby authorized and directed to dismiss all actions pending in court for the condemnation of the following-described tracts of real estate: The west half of the northwest quarter of section 13, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian; also the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 12 in the same township and range; also the east half of the northeast quarter of section 14, in the township and range aforesaid, excepting therefrom the rights of way of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and the Chicago, Memphis & Gulf Railroads, the total number of acres to be included within this description being 193.9 acres, situated in the county of Winnebago and State of Illinois. The south 253.44 feet of the southwest quarter lying east of the east bank of the Rock River of section 2, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian; also the northwest quarter lying east of the east bank of the Rock River of section 11, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian; also the south half of the northeast quarter (except railroad rights of way) of section 11, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian, but including the right or possibility of reverter of the part or portion of said premises conveyed to the Rockford & Interurban Railway Co. by deed dated August 20, 1917, and recorded on September 5, 1917, in book of deeds 256, on page 491, in the office of the recorder of Winnebago County, Ill., in the event the premises so conveyed shall cease to be used for railway purposes; also the north 14 acres of the southwest quarter lying east of the east bank of the Rock River of section 11, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian; all in Winnebago County, Ill., and containing in all 229.55 acres, more or less. The north half of the southwest quarter lying east of the east bank of Rock River (except the north 14 acres thereof), and the north half of the southeast quarter of section 11, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian, except that portion thereof conveyed to Illinois, Iowa & Minnesota Railway Co. by deed dated April 25, 1905, and recorded May 6, 1905, in book of deeds 187, page 302; also the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 12, township 43 north, range 1 east of the third principal meridian, comprising 162.94 acres, more or less, situated in the county of Winnebago, in the State of Illinois.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, at the time of the expiration of the leases now held by the War Department covering the several tracts of land hereinbefore described, to enter into new contracts for the lease of such portions of said land as he deems necessary, and for such length of time as he deems advisable, to enable the War Department to remove all Government buildings and other property now located on said premises: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase from the owner or owners such number of acres as in his judgment is necessary for the operation of the water plant now located thereon, or to lease the same for a term of years as his judgment may direct; and in the event of his inability either to lease or purchase the land necessary for the water plant, from the owner or owners thereof, that he is authorized to acquire the same through condemnation proceedings: Provided further, That the owners of said tracts of land, prior to the dismissal of all legal proceedings now pending, shall enter into contract and agreement with the War Department covering all rights of removal of Government property after the expiration of the lease, if not removed before the expiration of the lease; and also for the protection of the Government in relation to any water mains or sewer pipes which may cross any portion of said land."

The above-described tracts of real estate are located on the reservation at Camp Grant, Ill. Acquisition of the fee simple title to these lands has not been completed, but they are the subject of condemnation proceedings which were filed by the Government on June 30, 1919, in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, western division. The land described constitutes the three parcels of land owned as follows:

"(1) 230.36 acres, owned by John August Johnson.

"(2) 162.94 acres, owned by Sarah J. Baldwin.

"(3) 193.9 acres, owned by Charles A. Samuelson.

"No one of the three tracts listed above can be given up without interfering with the proper administration of Camp Grant and injuring the interests of the United States.

"The Johnson tract includes all the important buildings and heating plants connected with the station hospital, a large number of officers' quarters, and several important warehouses filled with property, in addition to other less essential camp features.

"The Baldwin tract includes within its limits the pumping station which is the base of the water supply, a large number of officers' quarters, and several important warehouses full of property, in addition to other less essential features. This tract lies between the Johnson tract and the main part of the camp.

"The Samuelson tract lies almost in the center of the Camp Grant reservation and includes within its limits ground absolutely necessary for the regular military and athletic activities of the camp—drill, inspections, ceremonies, and athletics."

The amendment noted under (b) above provides that the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to dismiss all actions pending in court for the condemnation of these tracts of real estate. The result of this would be that those three tracts of land, constituting a vital portion of the reservation at Camp Grant, would be taken from the United States and returned to the original owners, with the result that the reservation would be practically useless for the purpose intended unless great expense were incurred for the erection of buildings to take the place of those on the ground in question. It is true that the amendment provides that the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, at the time of the expiration of the leases now held by the War Department covering the several tracts of land in question, to enter into new contracts for leasing of such portions of said land as he deems necessary and for such length of time as he deems advisable to enable the War Department to remove all Government buildings and other property now located on said premises. It will be noted here, however, that this amendment provides only for the removal of such property as has been erected at great expense on these premises and which is absolutely indispensable for the proper administration of the camp. The removal of these buildings and utilities, in addition to rendering the camp useless for all practical purposes, would necessarily involve a very large expenditure of funds on the part of the War Department.

In view of the above, it is urgently recommended that the amendments noted under (a) and (b) above be stricken from the bill and that the bill be passed as originally presented by the War Department.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to ask the Senator another question. As I understand, the expenditure of the moneys appropriated in the bill is for the purpose of acquiring certain lands in order that the entire tract may then be sold?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will leave the Government free to sell it. May I say that I can not now pledge the War Department to the sale of all these properties. I do not know whether they will recommend the sale of all of them or only part of them, but at least the Congress itself will have the authority to direct their sale if in its judgment they should be sold in spite of the objection of the War Department.

Mr. SMOOT. As soon as title is acquired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When title is acquired we can do with these things what we please and that is the condition of affairs which I think we should reach mighty soon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I have in mind is this: I understand that the tracts which are to be acquired have valuable buildings on them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if we do not acquire title we lose the buildings. The question I have in mind is for what private purposes the buildings may be suitable?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Hardly any in many instances, and various purposes in some instances. The Brooklyn storage base is, of course, of immense value, and that is a base which I take it the Government should hold and lease to private individuals or to the city of New York if the city made a good offer; but some of these great storehouses I doubt that any individual could use; at least they could be salvaged and sold along with the land at a better figure than the Government could reach now when it does not own the land under them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator really think we would make money by investing more money, in order to get title to the land which has the buildings on it if the buildings are not suitable for use by the private parties?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, decidedly; yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That has been very carefully looked into by the committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it has been very carefully looked into by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that I understand unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill has not as yet been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill has been given.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that it has not been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent has been given.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, according to the practice of the Senate, if objection is interposed at any time pending the consideration of a bill, it arrests its consideration. I believe that is the practice of the Senate.

Mr. President, I want a little information about this proposed legislation before it is further considered. As I have been informed since coming on to the floor, the Government has erected upon certain lands, to which the Government had no title, certain buildings, and it is proposed by this legislation to acquire title to all the land upon which those structures have been erected. Is that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. The Government, may I say, owns the major portion of the lands in each case, but in some cases there are small parcels of land which remain to be acquired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The major purpose of this bill is to acquire title to the remaining portions of such land? Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and, incidentally, to pay the owners, for they have never yet been paid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand; and after title to these lands is acquired it is left discretionary with the Secretary of War as to whether the real estate so acquired shall be retained by the Government for the purposes of the War Department or shall be thereafter sold. Is that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is left discretionary with the Secretary of War, lacking any action of Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is always true. I suppose that Congress could pass a law requiring the Secretary of War to dispose of any property belonging to the United States Government which the War Department is using.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and Congress has done so, too.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, I understand that; but, after the title to this property is secured, it will be in the discretion of the Secretary of War as to whether any of it shall be alienated by the Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have been considerably interested, Mr. President, in reading and comprehending, in so far as I am able to do so, the report of the Secretary of War with respect to the military plans which the War Department of the Government has in hand, and I have been very much impressed with the fact, if the plans of the Secretary of War are consummated—and I am led to believe that the Military Committees of both branches of Congress must be advised of the proposed plans of the War Department—that we are inaugurating a policy which is to lay a very substantial foundation for a military system in this Government of ours upon which there may be constructed, in very short order, an Army of at least 2,000,000 men.

In view of the fact, Mr. President, that we have here now assembled in Washington a conference brought about by the adoption of a resolution here in the Senate looking to disarmament, as we supposed when we passed it; in view of the fact that we have here gathered a body representing great powers, presumably engaged in the business of cutting down military operations, of so reducing the expenditures for naval and land armament as to relieve the people of not only our own country but, as it reacts upon the other nations, of the whole world of this intolerable burden—in view of that fact, Mr. President, I was somewhat astounded to read in the report of the Secretary of War the plans which the War Department has for the upbuilding of an Army of 2,000,000 men in this country; for preserving and developing at a considerable expense an organization that will at once enable the United States, employing the conscription legislation which has been written into the law of our country, to build up here on very short order an Army of 2,000,000 men. That does not seem to me to jibe very well with the deliberations which are proceeding at the other end of the Avenue, news of which is carried not only to the re-motest parts of our own country but to all over the world, inspiring the hope that there is to be inaugurated some system of reducing all preparations for war for all the peoples of the world.

Mr. President, with the Secretary of War that we now have, who has put forth this ambitious program, concerning which I purpose to have something to say in a more analytical and extended way when Congress shall reassemble again, I do not know whether I, for one, want to see him invested with the discretion of acquiring title to property and holding it to fit into not only the monumental but the monstrous military program which he has outlined in his report. So, Mr. President, in the closing hours of this session, when the Congress is about to take a recess, and when the measure can not be fully debated, I am constrained to interpose an objection to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin comes too late. The bill was taken up after 2 o'clock——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, from that decision I appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his demand if the Senator from New York will allow the bill to go over?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want the bill to go over—that is what I stated—so that it may be considered by a full Senate and may be debated. It can not be passed to-day, and we might as well understand that now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, under the circumstances, and in view of the announcement of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will not press the bill any further to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York withdraws the bill.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the business of the Senate, and if any Senator desires to obtain the passage of a bill I shall be glad to yield for that purpose, but I wish to address the Senate for a few moments on an important subject. I will, however, defer to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] if he desires the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock, and by unanimous consent was temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Chair whether it is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now before the Senate, having been temporarily laid aside, and it will continue to be laid aside until it is brought before the Senate again.

Mr. KING. I move that it be brought before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has been recognized and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Jersey has just announced that he intends to submit some remarks, and I suggested that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that I am addressing the unfinished business.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who I understand desires to introduce a bill. I wish to be courteous to Senators, and before I begin my remarks I desire to allow Senators who have business to transact to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. KING. I wanted some measure to be pending before the Senate so that the Senator could not be taken from the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In compliance with the suggestion which has been made, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1919.

CLEARWATER, ST. JOE, AND SELWAY NATIONAL FORESTS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 77, being Order of Business No. 332. I do not think it will lead to any discussion at all.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us have the title of the bill read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "within," to insert "or within 6 miles of the exterior boundaries of"; and on page 2, line 7, after the word "coal," to insert "oil," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within or within 6 miles of the exterior boundaries of the Clearwater, St. Joe, or Selway National Forests, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may give not to exceed an equal value of such national forest land or timber, or other unreserved Government land, nonirrigable and not suitable for the raising of agricultural crops except grass, in Idaho, as may be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior and acceptable to the owner as fair compensation: Provided, That all selections made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal, oil, and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, as is provided for under section 9 of the act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stats., p. 862), for lands patented thereunder to entrymen.

Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall become parts of the national forest within or near to which they are situated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MOUNT M'KINLEY NATIONAL PARK, ALASKA.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] desired me to call up House bill 6262, being Order of Business 331, and ask for its immediate consideration, I having reported the bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 6262) to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does it carry an appropriation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it simply adds to Mount McKinley National Park some 445,000 square miles of mountainous lands in Alaska. Those are the lands in which the caribou and wild sheep, food for the Alaskan people, range and are bred and raised. There is not a foot of agricultural land in the area to be added to the national park.

Mr. KING. May I ask my colleague whether the bill restricts mineral exploration and location?

Mr. SMOOT. All of it.

Mr. KING. If it does, I think it ought not to.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that it does not restrict the lands any further than the lands that now fall within the forest reserves in the United States are restricted. As far as mining is concerned, a man can go into that reserve now and mine for minerals of any kind or character. This simply adds to that reservation, and does not interfere with the mining industry in any way whatever.

Mr. KING. The point I had in mind was that so many reserves are now being created and national parks established, and restrictions are imposed, either by law or by regulations of the Interior Department, which practically prohibit any mining or mineral development. As far as I am concerned, if this bill prohibits mineral development and mineral exploration I shall object to it. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I ask that it be read.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the bill is read I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that the bill adds 445,000 square miles to the park. That takes in pretty nearly all of Alaska.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are a little over 500,000 square miles in Alaska, and this is four hundred and odd thousand. The Senator must be mistaken about the area.

Mr. NORBECK. It takes in an area about 22 miles square.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I asked the Senator from Utah, and he said the area was 475,000 square miles.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If this bill adds 475,000 square miles to the park, I object.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the report, Mr. President, and this is what the department says:

The purpose of this act is to extend the boundaries of Mount McKinley National Park, in Alaska, to take in an additional 445 square miles of mountainous country, which is the home of large herds of mountain sheep and caribou, and does not embrace any lands that are desirable for agriculture.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Four hundred and forty-five square miles?

Mr. SMOOT. Did I not say that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I understood the Senator to say 445,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh! If I said "445,000," Mr. President, I was wrong.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. NORRIS. The mistake is a very small one. It is not material. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I regret very much to object, but if the proponents of the measure will consent to an amendment which will permit mineral development I shall not object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no necessity of the amendment, because this park will fall under the law existing to-day. Whatever law exists there to-day is not changed by this bill in any way, shape, or form. It just adds that amount of land to the park in Alaska. The Department of Agriculture says that there is where the caribou and wild sheep are located, and the food of the Alaska people comes largely from this district.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Utah.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA—COTTON PRODUCTION.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, in reply to the speech of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to-day, that I have so much confidence in the governments of our 48 States and our various organizations and societies in those States that I do not believe that any man, woman, or child will perish in the United States if they or their friends make their condition known.

While I am on my feet, I desire to insert in the RECORD a short statement of the world's production of cotton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WORLD'S COTTON CROP SMALLEST SINCE 1900—15,593,000 BALES IS ESTIMATE—UNITED STATES AND EGYPT FALL OFF 61.4 PER CENT.

World production of commercial cotton for 1921–22 was placed at 15,593,000 bales by the Department of Agriculture in a report made public last night. This is the smallest crop since 1900, the report stated, and compares with 20,650,000 bales produced in 1920.

Two of the most important cotton-producing countries, the United States and Egypt, suffered crop "disasters" during the year, the report asserted, producing only 61.4 per cent of their total production of last year, or 5,667,000 bales less than was produced in 1920. The cotton crop in China, South America, Mexico, and other countries, while said to be not so important commercially, was reported smaller than usual. Russia, which immediately before the war produced around 1,500,000 bales annually, has practically ceased to grow cotton, the report stated.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, my attention has been called to-day to a couple of editorials in the New York Journal of Commerce very unjustly attacking Mr. J. S. Wannamaker, president of the American Cotton Association. I feel that these editorials are entirely unjust, out of place, not true, and uncalled for.

I have known Mr. Wannamaker practically all of his life. He is a much younger man than I, and no man in my State or in the South stands any higher than Mr. Wannamaker. He is a banker, a large farmer, and interested in the upbuilding of our people. These editorials go to the very extreme in denouncing him as having informed the people the first of this year, perhaps last year, of the quantity of cotton on hand and of the acreage that was proposed to be planted. They attacked him unjustly. The only criticism in the world that can be made of Mr. Wannamaker is that he is an enthusiast and perhaps overzealous in trying to serve people who have but little remedy.

I want to say again that I repudiate the editorials. I deplore the making of any such unjust attack, and I commend Mr. Wannamaker highly to anybody and everybody in the United States. He is the one man in the South who has organized our people and aroused them to their duty and to the way of at least trying to make the raising of cotton more profitable. If our people would follow the advice of Mr. Wannamaker in diversifying their crops and making a living at home we would soon be in a much better condition.

As I said before, these editorials are out of place, uncalled for, and absolutely unjust.

EXPORTATION OF WHEAT.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for immediate action on Senate resolution 133, being Order of Business 371. The resolution requests the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation of the exports of wheat. It is unanimously recommended by the Agricultural Committee. There is a general demand throughout the western country for immediate action, and I understand that the Federal Trade Commission, if authorized, is ready to take up the investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 133. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if the shipping reports and the information which the Agricultural Department has do not furnish all the information sought by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LADD. No; they do not. The resolution seeks to have an investigation made as to the charges, the shipping, the freight rates, the subsidiary companies in this country and abroad, and all connections that there are in the handling of grain, beginning with the crop of 1919.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator say that the committee which was appointed some time ago to inquire into agricultural depression and the causes thereof, a joint committee of the House and Senate, would not have full authority to make the investigation contemplated by the resolution to which the Senator refers?

Mr. LADD. It is not referred to in the resolution that was passed in that connection. This resolution authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to make the investigation, to utilize the material and data in the various governmental departments; to determine the margins between farm and export prices; the freight and other costs of handling; the profits or losses of the principal exporting firms and corporations and their subsidiary or allied companies and firms; all the facts concerning market manipulations, if any, in connection with large export transactions, or otherwise; the organization, ownership, control, interrelationship, foreign subsidiaries, agencies, or connections of the concerns engaged in the export of grain, including the extent of their control of the facilities used by them; the organization, methods of operation, and so forth, so as to make the investigation complete.

Mr. KING. I can see that at least much of this information will be very valuable, and if the Senator states that there are no other instrumentalities now available for the purpose of obtaining the information I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the condition of the export market has been alleged as one of the reasons for the decline in the domestic prices of grain since the summer of 1920; and

Whereas there nevertheless has been during the past year a record volume of exports of grain from the United States and at prices showing a wide margin over the price at the farm; and

Whereas a wide spread of 15 to 20 cents between cash wheat and futures throughout the marketing season of 1920–21 existed and was caused either by the unprecedented export demand or heavy pressure on futures, or both; and

Whereas the organization of the export trade and all the conditions connected with the export of grain by American exporters and the purchase thereof by foreign buyers are of vital interest to American farmers and consumers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately investigate, beginning with the harvest of the 1919 grain crop, the margins between farm and export prices; the freight and other costs of handling; the profits or losses of the principal exporting firms and corporations and their subsidiary or allied companies and firms; all the facts concerning market manipulations, if any, in connection with large export transactions, or otherwise; the organization, ownership, control, interrelationship, foreign subsidiaries, agencies, or connections of the concerns engaged in the export of grain, including the extent of their control of the facilities used by them; the organization, methods of operation, and agencies used by foreign buyers of grain in this country; and other data affecting the demand for and foreign disposition, movement, and use of American exported grain; and report its findings and recommendations thereon as promptly as the various phases of the work are concluded. For the purpose of this investigation it is requested that the United States Grain Corporation, the Department of Agriculture, and other Government departments, and the United States Food Administration make available all the pertinent records from these several departments and organizations for the use of the commission.

STABILIZING THE COAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is on the calendar a bill known as Senate bill 1807, entitled "A bill to aid in stabilizing the coal industry." I have made several attempts to get that bill before the Senate and failed. I now want to make a brief statement regarding the bill, as I intend to call it up and ask for a vote upon it before the present session of Congress ends.

Section 4 of that bill provides:

That the Secretary shall from time to time investigate—

(1) The tonnage of coal produced and tonnage of coal sold in commerce, including railway fuel.

(2) The stocks of coal on hand in any section of the country or in such consuming territories or districts as may be outlined or designated by the Secretary and the consumption requirements in such sections or consuming territories or districts.

(3) The distribution of shipments of coal in commerce to any such section, territory, or district, including the distribution of coal cars.

(4) The contract and prevailing market prices received or paid for coal by persons engaged or interested in the mining, sale, storage, or distribution of coal.

Mr. President, when I last addressed the Senate, on the day the seasonal coal rate bill was sent back to committee, I said the coal question would not down. It has not downed. I was convinced then that the situation was critical. Nothing has since occurred to weaken my conviction. The coal question is right here to-day, staring us in the face. We can not dispose of it by ignoring it. The longer we delay, the more urgent and the more difficult will the decision be.

I said of Senate bill 1807 that it was meant simply to turn on the light. To call it regulation is to pervert the English language. Its only purpose is to throw the light of publicity and understanding on an industry which I and my associates on the Interstate Commerce Committee had come to realize did not know itself. The bill was opposed by an organized lobby of the coal interests who were afraid of the light and who wanted the people to continue to walk in darkness.

As a nation we are astonishingly ignorant about some of the elementary facts concerning our coal supply. Imagine a corporation that did not know how much coal it was burning, how much it was likely to need, what was a reasonable price to pay for coal, and never measured its stock pile except when there were signs of a shortage. Yet that is exactly the position of the people of the United States at this moment. They not only do not know these simple things but their Government can not find out.

To say that the Government of the United States is in the dark about these day-to-day facts of the coal supply is to charge that Government with negligence, but I can prove the charge on four counts.

There is only one thing that we know regularly about the coal supply, and that is the production. But production alone will not tell the story. We must know also what the relation of production is to requirements. For example, the latest figures show that up to November 26, the year 1921 was 83,000,000 tons behind normal. On that date the account stood as follows:

Produced in the year 1921, 372,000,000 tons, which is—

One hundred and twenty-eight million tons behind 1917.
One hundred and sixty million tons behind 1918.
Forty-five million tons behind 1919.
One hundred and twenty-three million tons behind 1920.

But of what value was it to know that production was anywhere from 45,000,000 to 160,000,000 tons behind, unless we knew also whether consumption was behind? Out of those figures the optimist could draw cheer and the pessimist predict the most terrible shortage in history. To understand the production figures we must know also the requirements and the stocks on hand. As to these indispensable facts we are in the dark.

I say we are in the dark about stocks. About once a year, when the situation looks desperate, some department does make a hurried, inadequate investigation of the amount of coal in shortage. In fact, such a hasty stock taking has just been made by the Department of Commerce. But the issuance of these sporadic reports may do as much harm as good. They come unannounced and unexpected, and sometimes have an unfortunate effect upon the market. Indeed, we must have adequate reports at regular intervals, conducted by some one agency which can develop the knowledge and the personnel to make them accurate. In three years we have had only four canvasses of stocks, conducted by four different departments. What we need is regular quarterly reports handled by one responsible department.

I say we are in the dark about requirements. Forecasting requirements is simply a matter of patient keeping of records, but the records are not being kept. We do not know what the current rate of consumption is. We do not know how much the steel industry has been using, and therefore we can not say how much it will use in the next quarter. We do not know at the time when it is needed what additions to stock are necessary in order to bring the reserves above ground up to the margin of safety. We are not looking ahead to ascertain the demands of our foreign customers. On all these facts, which could be ascertained so easily, we are in the dark, because it is no one's business to turn on the light.

I say we are in the dark about prices. Except for the retail prices quoted by the Department of Labor, we have no official records of what prices are being asked. The only thing we know is what the operators are willing to have known through the channels of their trade papers.

And lastly we are in the dark concerning the reasonableness of the price. One reason why production has fallen off so tremendously is that buyers are puzzled and uninformed. They are waiting for the price to come down. They will not trust the siren song of the coal man. When the coal operator advises them to "Buy now, the price is down to rock bottom," they put his statement down to propaganda. The whole matter turns on a question of fact, on what is the present cost of producing coal. But the buyer can not find out. I can not find out. You can not find out. The Government can not find out. The whole subject is shrouded in a smoke screen of inky darkness and has been ever since the National Coal Association in the Maynard Coal case obtained an injunction blocking the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of costs.

Now, it would be a simple matter to find out about these things as provided in the publicity bill. All that is needed is to turn on the light. All that is needed is to designate some Government agency to do the work. Why, the total cost of administering the bill would be less than what the National Coal Association pays its lawyers to fight legislation in this Congress. I say again that for a Government of 110,000,000 people not to ascertain these simple facts at a time when there are signs of a coal famine is criminally negligent.

Mr. President, there are the elements in the situation that arouse my apprehension. I am not predicting a shortage. I do not know. I, too, am blindfolded. But I am not muzzled. And I would be derelict in my duty to fail to call the possibilities to your attention.

The present situation is strangely like that which led up to the great miners' strike in 1919. Then, as now, there was a so-called "buyers' strike," a period of subnormal production and widespread unemployment among the coal miners. The discontent caused by that condition of unemployment was the direct cause of the miners' strike.

The present season differs from 1919 only in being much worse. As shown by the production, we are already 46,000,000 tons behind 1919. The unemployment has been much more acute, widespread, and prolonged. For many months the mines have been running less than half time. In the districts hardest hit by the depression there are hundreds of mines running only one or two days a week. Hundreds of other mines have closed entirely. Imagine yourself a day laborer in a mining camp in the mountains, dependent for support of yourself, your wife and children, on the mines, and being offered in the last month about 17 hours work a week, or barely 2 days. Do you think you would be in a mood to listen to a proposition to cut your daily wage of $7 under such conditions?

Mr. President, the present wage contracts in the union fields expire on March 31, 1922. On that day the wages to be paid over half a million men come up for settlement. It is clear that we are approaching a big labor readjustment, an adjustment fraught with possibilities of prolonged industrial upheaval. Yet we are doing practically nothing to forestall a break. We have not taken one step to alleviate the condition of the miners. Instead we have let the situation drift until the mine workers have endured the longest siege of unemployment since the panic of 1893. It is this situation, among others, that the subcommittee of which I was chairman had in mind in reporting the seasonable coal-rate bill. The seasonable slump in 1921 was worse than usual, and added to it was the industrial depression. To break the jam and start the coal moving, to provide employment for coal miners and alleviate their discontent, it was proposed to encourage summer buying by empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to order seasonal reduction in freight rates. But the organized coal lobby succeeded in recommitting the bill. This Chamber having before it a practical plan to ameliorate the lot of coal miners has listened to the coal lobby and put the plan by.

England liquidated her war-time miners' wage scale only after a three months' strike, which paralyzed all her industries and dealt her export trade a staggering blow. Our liquidation remains ahead of us. I am not predicting a strike. I hope and trust that some honorable settlement may be worked out which will safeguard the interests of the workers, the operators, and the public. But I submit that with no real information about the issues at stake, about wages, about costs, about profits, about prices, about supply and demand, we, the public, are in the worst possible state to meet the issue. We are in the dark. No, more than that, we are being led around in a game of blindman's buff by some merry gentlemen who have picked our pockets before, but who now, through their Washington lobby, ask us to trust ourselves to them.

ANTHRACITE.

So much for what the public does not know about bituminous coal. Turn now to anthracite. So far as hard coal is concerned, the figures show plenty of coal produced and transported. They show that up to the end of October 74,400,000 short tons of anthracite coal had been produced. This compared favorably with the record for preceding years.

Moreover, the movement to far-away destinations—New England and the Northwest, which are the regions most likely to suffer in time of winter shortage—is fully up to normal. New England had received during the first nine months of the year 8,750,000 short tons of anthracite, a half million tons more than in the same period in 1920 and a million more than in 1919. Receipts at Duluth-Superior, which is the gateway to the Northwest, up to the end of October were ahead of 1918, ahead of 1919, and ahead of 1920.

That much we know about the hard-coal supply. But we are in the dark about other things of the simplest and most elementary sort. Will anyone explain why with a supply ahead of last year the retail price of anthracite is higher to-day than it was a year ago? Here are the official Government figures from the Monthly Review of the Bureau of Labor Statistics:

Average retail price of anthracite coal for household use.

(Chestnut, per short ton.)

City	July 15, 1920.	July 15, 1921.	Increase.
Average, United States	$14.33	$14.95	$0.62
Boston	14.50	15.00	.50
Cleveland	14.03	14.20	.17
Milwaukee	14.90	15.94	1.04
Minneapolis	16.56	17.73	1.17
New York	13.07	13.30	.23
Philadelphia	12.00	12.61	.61
Washington, D. C	12.38	12.88	.50

Remember, these increases in coal prices are for a period when other prices have been falling.

Mr. President, we have grown accustomed to high prices and somewhat indifferent to them. I dare say there is no Member of this body who knows what it is to be cold, no one, however quick his sympathies, to whom the high price is more than an inconvenience. But there are people to whom $15 anthracite means going without. There are people to whom it means hardship and suffering and disease, to whom it means choosing between food and warmth, because they can not pay for both. You think that is exaggeration, perhaps. Listen to what the president of the board of child welfare of New York, which handles thousands of cases of widowed mothers and children, says:

> During the influenza epidemic * * * one of the greatest elements that aided the spread of the disease was the high price of coal, which the poor families could ill afford to purchase.
> Old people were found in a pitiable state, many of them unable to secure warmth to give strength to their bodies, and children were the greatest sufferers.
> The high prices hit them the hardest because, having no storage facilities, they can only purchase a few pounds at a time, and the small delivery is the highest in price.
> This matter became of such vital concern * * * that a fund was raised by the board of child welfare to meet this question of coal in the homes of the poor.

The fund was used last winter. It will be needed again this winter.

Mr. President, this is the condition that exists in New York City to-day, and its counterpart can be found in every other great city. The millions of unemployed face a winter of cold and hunger. Many of them will want for bread, and we are going to offer them coal at $15 a ton.

In New York, according to the president of the board of child welfare, the people are facing a most difficult winter:

> On account of the deplorable industrial condition, the burden falls heaviest on those families where the bread-winning possibilities are at lowest ebb. We mine 43 per cent of all the world's coal; we hold more than half of the world's unmined reserve, yet thousands of families must become charitable charges in order to secure a sufficient amount of warmth for the commonest creature comforts.

I do not wish to be unjust to the coal men. I know what the explanations are that they offer for these advances in the price of anthracite. The high cost of materials, a dull market for steam sizes, an increase in wages last summer, the increase in freight rates, these oft-repeated explanations are familiar to every Member of this body. The point I am making is that the public has no means of testing the truth of the explanations. Perhaps it is the truth. Perhaps it is not. All that the public and the Government know is only what the eight railroad coal companies want them to know.

We do not know because we are not permitted to know. We can not find out what the costs are because the National Coal Association has put out the eyes of the Government by the injunction in the Maynard Coal case.

We may recall that if increased freight rates are an element in the increased price, that increase has gone largely into the pockets of the anthracite coal-carrying roads which own the mines, and that these roads were already among the most prosperous in the country.

We do know, according to the Baltimore Sun of June 7, that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. made profits of $6,672,000 in 1920 as against $2,464,000 in 1916, an increase of 170 per cent. We know that the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co., having for the last 10 years or more paid 13 per cent regularly, on March 5, 1921, paid a cash dividend of 150 per cent.

Two weeks ago the same company paid another dividend of $35 on its $50 shares, or at the rate of 70 per cent. In other words, this anthracite producer has in one year paid dividends amounting to 220 per cent.

The authority for this statement is the December 1, 1921, issue of Coal Age, page 893, wherein it is stated:

> The Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. announced November 21, a special dividend of $35 a share. It is payable November 29 to stock of record November 21.

That the par value of the shares of the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. is $50 is verified by records of Poor's Manual of Industrials, 1918, page 2407.

Further, we are told that the Lehigh Valley Coal Sales Co. paid 10 per cent each year from 1913 to 1916. In addition it—the Lehigh Valley Coal Sales Co.—issued a stock allotment of 25 per cent in 1914. In 1917 it paid a dividend of 13 per cent and issued a stock allotment of 30 per cent. In 1918 it paid 16 per cent and an extra dividend of 10 per cent in Liberty bonds. In 1920 it paid 16 per cent.

The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co. paid 10 per cent annually from its inauguration in 1909 until 1912. In 1913 it paid 30 per cent and in 1914 20 per cent. In 1915 it paid 60 per cent. In 1916 it paid 20 per cent. In 1917 it paid 100 per cent, 60 per cent in cash and 40 per cent in Liberty bonds and notes of Great Britain. In 1918 it paid 40 per cent, the 30 per cent extra being in Liberty bonds. In 1919 it paid 10 per cent, and in 1920 10 per cent cash and a stock dividend of 75 per cent.

Now, these fabulous dividends paid by the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co. represented profits on only one branch of the business, the selling of the coal. During the same years the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was making another enormous profit out of the mining and transportation of the coal. These figures are taken from Poor's Manual of Railroads for 1921, page 426. Now listen. This anthracite carrier paid 20 per cent in 1908. In 1909 it paid 85 per cent. In 1910 it paid 20 per cent. In 1911 it paid 55 per cent. From 1912 to 1916 it paid each year 20 per cent. In 1917 it paid 22½ per cent. In 1918 it paid 20 per cent, and the same in 1919 and 1920. In 1921 it has already paid 15 per cent, and on August 20, 1921, two months ago, the shareholders received a stock dividend of 100 per cent.

The mails of the Government departments contain hundreds of letters inquiring why the price of anthracite is so high. My own mail is flooded with them. Some of the letters are abusive, some of them are querulous. Many of them are honestly written by people who are seeking light. They want to know if the high price is reasonable. If it is, they will pay it. But if they are being gouged by the eight corporations that have a natural monopoly of the anthracite reserves that produce 75 per cent of the tonnage and that hold the so-called independents in the hollow of their hands, they want to know that, too. Surely that is a reasonable question. Surely to answer it is a reasonable function of government. But no man in the Government is able to answer it. The coal lobby has tied the Government's hands and poked out its eyes. But they have not stopped the questioning of the people. Neither can the Senate stop it by ignoring the subject at this time.

I say to you that the question of whether a gigantic combine is demanding extortionate prices for a necessity of life is one that no democratic Government can ignore and live. Will you turn on the light? Or will you go back to your people, and when they ask you why, refer them once more to the coal operator?

HANS P. GUTTORMSEN.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 423, for the relief of Hans P. Guttormsen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Hans P. Guttormsen, a former employee at the Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill., the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TURKISH ATROCITIES IN ASIA MINOR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate while I direct their thoughts to a subject which should excite the interest of all Christian peoples. For years the world has been appalled at the authenticated reports of Turkish atrocities in Armenia and in various parts of the Turkish Empire. The barbarous treatment of the Christian peoples of the Balkan States provoked wars and finally led to the emancipation of those States from Ottoman oppression. The reports of the barbarous treatment inflicted by the Turkish authorities upon Christian peoples living under the Turkish Government were not exaggerated. Indeed, perhaps history will never know all the bloody and savage deeds that were perpetrated by the Turks upon the helpless minorities who were under Turkish rule. The record of the persecution of the Armenians has been verified so often that no one attempts to controvert the hideous facts which have been published to the world.

Prior to the accession to power of what is called the Young Turks' régime, organized expeditions were set on foot for the massacre of the Armenian people. Those familiar with the history of the Armenian race are filled with admiration because of their heroism and sublime courage and devotion to religious ideals. At the same time sorrow and indignation are experienced at the sad fate which has overtaken that unhappy people. Under the administration of the Turkish Government, after it had passed into the control of the Young Turks, the persecution of the Armenians was renewed and hundreds of thousands were massacred and the most barbarous treatment accorded to those who survived. The remonstrances of the Christian nations availed but little, and it became evident that it was the design of the Turkish Government to exterminate the Armenian race.

At the outbreak of the World War the remnants of the Armenian race within the limits of the Turkish territory were widely scattered throughout Asia Minor. During the war they were placed in a most precarious situation. The Turkish nation gave support to the Central Empires and waged fierce and relentless war against the Allies. A portion of the territory occupied by the Armenians was the theater of conflicts between the Russian troops and Turkish forces.

Many were drafted into the Turkish Army and gave their lives upon battle fields and in the deserts and plains of Anatolia. And when the war was in progress the most merciless warfare was waged against them. German military authorities not only connived at but encouraged the ruthless persecution of all Armenian people in Asiatic Turkey. Perhaps it will never be known how many were butchered by the Turks and by the roving bands of Kurds who invaded Turkish territory occupied by the Armenians. Tens of thousands of men, women, and children were driven from their homes into the deserts, where they were subjected to the most brutal treatment, and where they miserably perished at the hands of cruel guards and fanatical Turks and roving bands of Kurds, and as a result of the privations to which they were subjected. No more tragic page can be found in history than that which records the cruel and inhuman persecution of the Armenians during the period of the World War.

Following the war the survivors of this unhappy race who were still in Asia Minor attempted to bring together the scattered remnants and organize a government. The work which they performed was magnificent, and if they had been accorded proper support from this and other nations their government would have survived. It is the earnest prayer of all who love liberty and religious freedom that there may yet appear a vigorous and enduring Armenian State. Notwithstanding that recognition was accorded the Republic which the Armenians established following the war, but little support was given to it, and the bolshevists upon the north and the barbarous Turks in Asia Minor have crushed, if not destroyed, it. Moreover, the remnants of this unhappy race have further been persecuted and their numbers by cruel massacres still further reduced.

We often speak of war being justified in the interest of humanity. The United States, it is alleged by many, declared war against Spain because of the brutal and inhuman treatment accorded the people of Cuba, and so waged war in the interest of humanity. There are causes which justify war. I respectfully submit that the Christian peoples of the world ought to have interposed to prevent the recurring massacres of the Armenian people and the execution of the diabolical purpose of the Ottoman Turks to exterminate the Armenian race. When the new Armenian Republic was established, and when it was accorded recognition by this and other nations of the earth, they should have, in the interest of humanity, exerted their powerful influence to prevent the Turks from continuing their merciless war of extermination, which even to the present moment continues.

Armenia was the outpost of Christianity for centuries. The invading Mongolians and other Asiatic tribes that inundated Europe were stoutly and stubbornly resisted for centuries by the brave and heroic Armenians. Though repeated tides of barbarous orientals overwhelmed them, their resiliency, their courage, and their faith enabled them to survive, though their numbers were constantly reduced. They did not forsake their religious faith or their ideals, but constantly held aloft the banner of Christianity, and sought to maintain the culture, the traditions, and the civilization of which they were such glorious exponents.

The world seems to have become so indurated by cruelty and bloodshed and oppression that a recital of the barbarities now being committed by the Turks arouse but slight interest. If resentment is awakened it seems to be only for the moment, and we lapse into a condition of apathy and regard with but transient interest conditions which, though tragic and awful, we affect to believe are inevitable.

With these monstrous crimes against humanity and civilization, it were time that the nations of the world should unite in some bond of union against the barbarities and horrors which have destroyed peoples and drenched the earth with blood and tears, and formulate international laws and regulations under which peace and justice shall be the inheritance of all.

But the Turks have not confined their persecutions in Asia Minor to the Armenians. They have inflicted the greatest cruelties upon the Greeks who reside within Turkish territory. The persecutions of the Pontian Greeks have been indescribably barbarous and deadly. Hundreds of thousands of the Greeks of Pontus have been compelled to flee to Russia and hundreds of thousands had been massacred or driven from their homes into the deserts and waste places where death was to them a release from the horrors and tortures to which they had been subjected. Even now the persecutions continue, and the Kemalist government in Anatolia is carrying on in a most bloodthirsty manner a policy which if unrestrained will culminate in the extermination of the hundreds of thousands of Greeks who have built hundreds of cities and towns and villages along the littoral of the Black Sea and who have added to the wealth and the prosperity of the Turkish Empire.

Most of the American people are unaware of the extent of this exterminating crusade which has been waged and is now being waged against the Greeks of Pontus. At a mass meeting of American citizens of Greek descent, recently held in New York City, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas positive information from the Ecumenical Patriarchate and various prominent societies of Pontus Greeks in Constantinople and elsewhere, including eyewitnesses, proves definitely that the Nationalist Turks, under Mustapha Kemal Pasha, are carrying out a systematic extermination, coolly planned years ago, against the unarmed and loyal civil Greek population of the entire territory within their control, particularly in the Black Sea littoral;

Whereas the Nationalists, in carrying out their persecution and extermination, have been arresting for months thousands of innocent, leading Greeks under various false accusations, and have thrown them into unhygienic jails, subjecting them to indescribable horrors of torture and torment, as a result of which many have died, then bringing the survivors to mock trial before the so-called "courts of independence," condemned to death 168 Greeks in Amasia early in September, and have actually hanged 151 of them; similarly 190 others were hanged in Ordou and others elsewhere;

Whereas the Nationalists have already deported all the male Greeks from their homes, killing most of them on the way and forcing the survivors into inhospitable regions in the interior, such as Harpot and Malatia and Erzerum, thus condemning them to die of starvation, exposure, and disease;

Whereas after the deportation of men the Turks, under the protection of the law, have looted the Greek stores and houses, thus depriving the women and children of all means of livelihood and protection, and thereafter have doomed those women and children to destruction, sending them into the interior in the company of ferocious Turkish guards, who had absolute control and authority over them, thus subjecting them to every form of cruelty;

Whereas millions of Americans, including many thousands of Greek descent from the territories under the Kemalist terror, fought in the Great War, many making the last sacrifice for the ends our Government had in view, one of which was to secure protection, peace, and liberty for the Christians and other oppressed races in the Near East;

Whereas the Kemalists are at present carrying on a wild propaganda alleging that all these reports of atrocities, massacres, and deportations are fabrications or exaggerations;

Whereas the ruling Turk, by his continuous misrule, has forfeited, in the eyes of the civilized world, all right to self-government, and much less can he be trusted any more with the keeping and protection of other races: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the name of common humanity and Christian compassion we earnestly and urgently request our Government in Washington to use its great influence and power that steps may be taken by the representatives of the great powers—

First. For the immediate cessation of all persecution and deportation of Greeks, Armenians, and other oppressed races by the Nationalist Turks.

Second. For the immediate return of the surviving deportees to their homes before the winter sets in and for the restoration of their means of livelihood.

Third. For the restriction and control by the forces of civilization of the political power of the Turk, so that permanent protection and rights of life, honor, and property be secured to the oppressed Greeks, Armenians, and other non-Turkish races, yea, even to the Turkish people themselves.

Fourth. For the appointment of an international committee to visit the afflicted regions and investigate the truth of our complaint and statement of facts, which are but a fraction of the horrible truth that such investigation will bring to light; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the representatives of the powers assembled at the Disarmament Conference in Washington.

Prior to the adoption of these resolutions I had received authentic information concerning the persecutions to which the Pontian Greeks had been subjected, particularly during and since the World War, and also the ruthless exterminating policy which had been inaugurated and was being carried into execution by the Kemalist régime of Anatolia.

Mr. President, the evidence is overwhelming, and to my mind conclusive, that the statements contained in the resolutions do not overdraw the picture. Indeed, the situation is far more tragic than that depicted in the resolutions. Unless some steps shall be taken by forces outside of Turkey to restrain the bloody hands of Mustapha Kemal, there would seem to be no hope of salvation for these unfortunate people, whose only offense is that they are Christians and have sought to give to Turkey a civilization and a culture that would lift the Ottoman Turks to a higher plane, where they might be fit to associate with the civilized and progressive nations of the world.

On the 14th of December I presented to the Senate the following resolution:

Whereas the treaty between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan on the one part and Turkey on the other part, signed at Sevres on the 10th day of August, 1920, makes complete and particular provision for the protection of racial and religious minorities within the territory committed to the sovereignty of Turkey, including Pontus on the southern littoral of the Black Sea; and

Whereas by article 141 of said treaty Turkey undertook specifically to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Turkey, without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion, and in article 144 further undertook to facilitate the return to their homes and the restoration to their properties and business of all persons who had become exiles by reason of the terrorist régime in Turkey during the late war; and

Whereas, in violation of the stipulation of said treaty and in violation of the laws and customs of nations and of the principles of national morality and of justice recognized by all civilized States, the so-called Kemalist régime in Anatolia has continued the massacre of the Christian population of Anatolia, and particularly of the inhabitants of Pontus, who are of the Greek race and religion, by which such inhabitants have been deprived not only of their properties and business but have been subjected to a system of ruthless decimation and extermination; and

Whereas the Government of France has recognized the Kemalist régime as the de facto and as the lawful Government of Turkey; and

Whereas the inhabitants of Pontus have no redress or recourse for protection and vindication except by appeal to the powers which are parties to the treaty of Sevres; and

Whereas by article 151 of said treaty said powers agreed to consult with the council of the League of Nations upon measures necessary to guarantee the execution of part 4 of said treaty, including the articles aforesaid, and the Turkish Government agreed to accept all decisions taken in that behalf: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States expresses abhorrence and condemnation of the brutal and ruthless persecution of the Greeks of Pontus by the Government of Kemal Pasha and by Ottoman Turks in Anatolia, and deplores the failure of the European powers to take effective measures to restore and maintain order in Anatolia in conformity to the treaty of Sevres, and to exercise the authority reserved by said powers in that behalf; and the Senate respectfully requests that the President of the United States bring the atrocities in Pontus to the attention of the European powers and the council of the League of Nations, to the end that adequate and expeditious measures be taken in accordance with said treaty, to arrest the persecution and extermination of the inhabitants of Pontus who are of the Greek race and religion, and generally to enforce and vindicate the rights accorded racial and religious minorities in Anatolia by the said treaty.

Mr. President, the recitations contained in this resolution are entirely justified by the records which are available to all who are desirous of learning the facts. At this point I desire to place in the RECORD a statement made by the Ecumenical Patriarchate under date of October 7, 1921, and addressed to the high commissioners at Constantinople. Senators will recall that Constantinople is now under the control of the allied Governments. As I remember, three commissioners represent the allied nations and have practically the political control of Constantinople.

The Ecumenical Patriarchate, which is the Constantinople synod of the Greek Orthodox Church, has been brought into contact with the Kemalist régime and its cruel and merciless persecutions of the Greeks in Asia Minor, and has from time to time given out facts with reference thereto.

The Turkish gazettes Ehali and Hihal, appearing in Samsoun, published in their last issues of 18th, 19th, and 25th of September the names of 3 Armenians and 163 Greeks, and among them those of two Greek Protestants, one missionary and the other a professor in the American college at Merzifoun, condemned to death, after a summary and derisory judgment of the so-called tribunals that are established by the sovereign authority which has substituted that of the Sultan. With the exception of 17 absent persons, among whom the Metropolitan of Amasia, actually a member of the holy synod, the others were executed. Many notables and also prelates and other ecclesiastics are included in the list of victims.

This testimony out of a Turkish source confirms the atrocities which the Ecumenical Patriarchate denounced from time to time since the armistice, and we do not hesitate now to make known to Your Excellency that, following the news emanating from all parts of the Black Sea littoral, the deportations and the wholesale executions of our Christian people continue and extend to a vast zone and that the women and the children are threatened in their turn by a wholesale massacre if no one comes to their assistance in time.

It is beyond doubt a system of extermination of Greeks and Armenians to the last through the whole territory of Asia Minor. We may add that no military necessity, no political precaution of any kind, can justify or explain the barbarous treatment to which our unhappy deportees are submitted; we have no knowledge that the Mussulmans in the territories annexed to Greece or merely under Greek administration have gone through any suffering simply because their sympathies are with the Turks.

We dare hope that the great powers will decide to take, even before it is too late, the necessary steps to put an end to these things so contrary to the general interest of Europe, no less than to the sentiments animating the Governments of the great liberal nations, in whose name the loftiest principles were announced, but for the application of which the Christians of the East are still waiting.

Under date of October 19, 1921, the Ecumenical Patriarchate issued the following supplementary statement:

It is impossible to expose the real situation brought about to the Christian communities of Asia Minor by the Kemalist régime since the time of the armistice, especially during the present year, 1921, because it is impossible to communicate with these communities, for the reason that their spiritual heads have been dispersed and also because they are strictly isolated from any outside intercourse.

However, the general lines of the terrible vision of woe that betook the entire Hellenism of Asia Minor, owing to Mustapha Kemal, are well known. This tyrant of Asia Minor, a worthy successor in that land of the Turkish dictators Talahat and Enver, made so conspicuous during the war, continues the application of the program of these two notorious young Turks, by trying to solve the Hellenic question in Asia Minor through the wholesale extermination of its Greek inhabitants in the same way they once endeavored to solve the Armenian question by the total annihilation of the Armenian nation. Taking advantage of the opportunity that was open to him after the armistice, being that there are no longer in Anatolia any Europeans or Americans to witness with their own eyes the terrible atrocities, he hastens to complete the program of extermination of the Hellenism of Asia Minor as soon as possible before peace is concluded and his task left unfinished.

From information obtained by the Ecumenical Patriarchate from reliable sources, it is a confirmed fact that all the adult Greek male inhabitants of the provinces of Cesarea, Amasia, Neocesarea, Iconium, Trebizond, Angora, Chaldia, Kolonia, Heliopolis, and Rhodopolis, as well as of parts of the Provinces of Cyzicus, Nicomedia, Nice, Chalcedon, Broussa, Pisidia, and Philadelphia, that are or had been under the Kemalist yoke, all the male inhabitants from 15 to 60, 65, and 70 years have been deported to inhospitable lands in the interior of Asia Minor to the vilayets of Van, Bitlis, Diarbekir, Erzerum, and Mamuretul-Aziz, and so they lost all track of their families. During this transportation Mustapha Kemal exceeded in savagery the Young Turks, who undertook a similar one during the World War, for, while they were pursuing the annihilation of the deported rather by means of hunger and thirst and long, forced marches, by means of privations and sickness, Mustapha Kemal decimates the deported by shells of guns and machine guns and by wholesale slaughter. We shall mention what has happened in Samsoun. Three contingents of Greek deportees were sent from this city to the interior, each consisting of about 1,000 persons. It has been confirmed that at Kavak, a distance of eight hours from Samsoun, 216 out of the first contingent were killed by the gendarmes accompanying these escorts, and 250 from the third. The second contingent was also decimated, but the number of killed is unknown. Those who are spared either fell in the middle of the road exhausted from hunger and privations, or died from sufferings in the locations where they are confined, because, purposely, they are deprived of any monetary or other relief on the part of their relatives, or rot in prisons accused of imaginary crimes which they have never committed. By far more painful is the condition of women and children left in their homes. From various informations that come from the provinces, especially from Pontus, and the central sections of Asia Minor, it has been ascertained that the gendarmes and the thieves constituting the Turkish bands are reveling in atrocious orgies against the Christian women, many of whom were by force abducted to Turkish harems. On the other hand, by the method of requisition, compulsory taxation, etc., the last penny has been taken away from these families, and as the Turks are forbidden to buy from them any real or personal property, these families are deprived of any means to make their living.

But that is not all. At many points, and especially in the vast extents of the Pontus littoral (Provinces of Amasia, Neocesarea, Chaldia, Kolonia, and part of Kerasund), even the women and children were deported. How many of them have been saved from the claws of death is not known. But it is more than certain that on account of the coming winter no one among them will survive, and so the humane decision taken by the League of Nations for the salvation of these deported women and children will be of no avail. It is rumored that in this section more than 180,000 souls perished already, but this number includes the deceased males as well.

But what is more surprising still is the total destruction of Christian towns and villages, especially in the districts of Pontus and those of Nicomedia and Nice, Pisidia and Heliopolis. It is really amazing that the Turks, not satisfied with the extermination of the Christian population, destroy everything standing erect, that the surviving Christians, if any, may never find trace of their homes. Thus, we learn that out of the towns and villages of the Provinces of Pontus, which amount to 338 in the Province of Amasia, to 145 in the Province of Chaldia, and to 195 in the Province of Neocesarea, all those situated in a few hours' distance from the shore, and those in the interior have been destroyed by fires. Out of the said number of 338 villages in the Province of Amasia, only Samsoun, Bafra, Alacham, Amasia, and two, or at the most three, other maritime settlements are left. Even in the Province of Nicomedia, in the very gates of the capital city of Constantinople, many towns and villages belonging to historic Bithynia are in ruins.

Yet to these trials a new one is added by the ferocious Mustapha Kemal. The so-called independent courts, founded by him, namely for trying suspected persons, but in reality for committing official crimes, since two months now condemn to capital punishment the best Greek element of Pontus and of the central provinces. In one day alone they hanged in the square of Samsoun 172 Greeks, doctors, druggists, lawyers, editors, managers, large estate owners, merchants, clerks, and among others the over 80-years-old Protosyngellos of the Holy Metropolis of Amasia, the Archimamdrite Platon Aivazides. They also condemned to death and hanged the deputy from Trezibond, Mr. Matthew Cofides, Prof. George Papamarkou, of Samsoun, and Mr. Pantazides, professor in the American College of Merzefoun, and the Protestant preacher, Paul, of the same college. Aside from this there died in the prison of Amasia Bishop Zelon Euthymios, and rots in exile in Erzeroum the Metropolitan of Iconium Prokopios, together with the Armenian Metropolitan of Iconium, and the fate of Bishop Gervasios, Metropolitan Vicar of the Province of Kolonia, is unknown.

Such is, in general lines, the picture of Hellenism in Asia Minor; no worse exists in the long history of calamities and sufferings of the Greek nation.

Pontus, as I have indicated, is a part of Asiatic Turkey, and the treaty of Sevres did not attempt to detach it from Turkey or to award it to the Kingdom of Greece. Notwithstanding the district of Pontus is under Turkish control, those belonging to the Hellenic nation could not be otherwise than profoundly interested in the Pontian Greeks, though they were subjects of Turkey and perhaps for an indefinite period might continue under Turkish rule.

It may be interesting to present some historical facts concerning Pontus and its inhabitants. We must go into the dim past to get the first historical glimpse of Pontus. The district of Pontus covers an area of, perhaps, 450 miles easterly and westerly and from 75 to 150 or 200 miles northerly and southerly, bordering upon the southern coast of the Black Sea. The easterly limits of Pontus begin but a short distance from Batum, an important seacoast city upon the Black Sea; and the westerly limits extend some little distance beyond the town of Mezet, which is likewise upon the Black Sea. Hundreds of important seacoast towns are found within this vast territory, and there are likewise hundreds of towns and villages scattered over the entire territory of Pontus. Even in ancient times the natural resources and riches of Pontus were known, and its importance as a State was recognized. Its maritime business was extensive; and its trade and commerce enriched its inhabitants and gave it influence and power among the peoples of Asia Minor and southeastern Europe.

Pontus was colonized by the Greeks nearly a thousand years before Christ; and we are told by some historians that the Argonautic expedition of Jason founded the State of Pontus. The Greeks, even in those early days, were a brave and adventuresome people. They loved the sea and established important cities and towns, not only in the region of the Ægean Sea and along Mediterranean coasts, but they planted colonies along the southern borders of the Black Sea. As early as 756 B. C. the city of Trapezus—Trebizond—was founded by a colony of Sinopians; and we are furnished much information regarding it by Xenophon in his "Anabasis." Senators will recall the memorable march of Xenophon and his 10,000 soldiers. They were hospitably received by the Greeks of Trapezus. And from Xenophon we learn that even at that early date considerable progress had been made in the establishment of Greek colonies upon the shores of the Black Sea. For hundreds of miles along the southern coast of the Black Sea and extending some distance into the interior many colonies of Greeks were established, beginning nearly a thousand years before Christian era and extending to a period perhaps later than the birth of Christ.

The inhabitants of this vast region were enterprising and industrious, and developed a high state of civilization. There is something remarkable about the Greeks of those early periods. Their numbers were not great, and they were scattered along the shores of the Mediterranean Sea and the coasts of the Ægean Sea, and occupied the southern shores of the Black Sea. But wherever they were, though separated by lands and seas, with no organization which bound them into a political union, they still preserved the ideals and the culture that were developed in Athens and in the city States of Greece. What we call Greece, together with the Ægean Isles and a portion of Asia Minor, comprising what are known as the vilayets of Smyrna and Brusa—that is to say, Greece proper and her great colonies—was an inexhaustible treasure house which gave its riches for the enlightenment and civilization of the world. Poetry and art and literature and science, these were the products of ancient Greece; and the influence of the Hellenic race has been felt in all lands, and it has made powerful contribution to the development and progress of the world.

The Pontian Greeks responded to the best that was produced in the region of the Ægean Sea, and Pontus became a center of Greek culture. Nearly 3,000 years have passed since the first Greek colony was established there, and many of the ancient settlements exist to this day under the same names and upon the same sites where they were first established. It is remarkable that during all the centuries that have intervened, notwithstanding the long period of Turkish rule, the Pontian Greeks have preserved their individuality, their language, and, indeed, the ideals and aspirations of the people of the Greek Nation. Neither persecution nor tides of invasion of other races have absorbed or destroyed them. They are still Greeks possessing a national spirit and imbued with the ideals of those within the Greek State.

A people with an historic record of such interest and with achievements and victories, moral and otherwise, so memorable are entitled to the admiration and, indeed, the gratitude of the world, and their destruction would not only be an international calamity but it would constitute a crime so frightful, so colossal, as to call down the wrath of an offended Deity upon the perpetrators and compel the condemnation of all civilized nations.

When the Roman Empire, seeking world conquest, directed its legions against Greece and all Hellenic Provinces, Pontus in this Roman invasion fell under Roman control. However, the Roman emperors accepted as autonomous many of the cities of the Pontus region. When the Hellenization of the eastern Roman Empire occurred Pontus constituted a part of the Byzantine Empire, and for a considerable period it formed a separate State under illustrious rulers. Even after the fall of Constantinople, as a result of the assaults of the Turks, the capital of Pontus withstood their military operations until 1461. With the fall of Trebizond, the Pontian capital, the Turks inundated the land. The inhabitants were subjected to persecution and at times to an oppressive servitude; but notwithstanding the situation, they maintained their courage, and by their devotion to Hellenic ideals and by reason of their intellectual superiority they were often able to blunt the keen edge of persecution and to secure immunity from destructive Ottoman policies. Their noble example and integrity and ability impressed and at times influenced their Turkish oppressors and resulted in periods during which, free from persecution, they were able to repair in part the disasters resulting from Turkish oppression and misrule. Now and then a Turkish Sultan, more liberal than his predecessors, would permit freedom of thought and religion and opportunity for commercial and material development and progress. But regardless of conditions resulting from Turkish authority, the robust and gallant people maintained their religious faith, their ideals, and their national spirit, and those qualities which have preserved them as a people in all the dark days through which they have passed. They have maintained to this day their language, their culture, and their traditions, and it is significant that the Greek language spoken in Pontus today abounds in archaic expressions—a fact which is characteristic of the perseverance by which they have clung to their national language and faith.

But the periods during which they were free from cruel persecutions were of short duration. The Turkish governors and military authorities were from time to time engaged in massacres and the most horrible and cruel persecutions. Thousands of young men would be seized and forced into the military service and into the Janissaries. Young girls would be forcibly seized and become the victims of a cruel and beastly soldiery, while others were carried away and placed in the harems of Turkish lords and rulers. Efforts would be made to force an abandonment of the Greek language, and to accomplish this end the tongues of the children would be cut out. It was thought that if they could not speak their language would be forgotten and the next generation would accept the Turkish language.

These persecutions prevented that increase in the population of Pontus which otherwise would have resulted. However, about the middle of the nineteenth century the population was approximately 1,000,000. With the waning power of the Turkish Empire, the persecutions of the Greeks and the Armenians increased, and in some sections and cities the populations were practically destroyed. So cruel and bitter had become the persecutions that many thousands were compelled to leave Pontus during the middle of the nineteeth century and they sought an asylum in southern Russia. Perhaps the number who have fled from Pontus and have taken refuge in Russia during this period and up to the present time would approximate 300,000.

Many of the Pontian Greeks who were unable to flee were butchered, and in some sections, in order to save themselves from extermination, there were wholesale professed conversions to Mohammedanism. It is recorded that in the seventeenth century in the region south and east of Trapezus nearly 200,000 of the inhabitants professed Mohammedanism when it became certain that their destruction was inevitable unless this course was pursued. However, though the people accepted Mohammedanism in name, they preserved their Bibles and relics of Christian worship, and their faith in Christianity was not extinguished; and in their homes they also maintained Greek customs and spoke the Greek dialect of Pontus. There are examples of persons who were forced to profess Mohammedanism and who during the remainder of their lives continued the worship of God in underground retreats and taught their children the Christian faith.

The Christian powers of Europe from time to time remonstrated with the Turkish Government because of its persecution of its Christian subjects. Reforms were promised but seldom instituted. In 1836 the demands of the Christian nations of Europe were heeded by the Turkish Government and liberty of conscience was proclaimed. Even then persecutions continued and thousands of Christians were murdered and tens of thousands driven from their homes and subjected to the most barbarous treatment.

In 1865 European ambassadors at Constantinople intervened and the Turkish Government promised religious liberty. Following this thousands of Greeks who had been forced to profess Mohammedanism joyously affirmed their faith in the religion of their fathers and openly gave adherence to the Greek Orthodox Church. The Turks, perceiving that they had been unable to destroy the faith of the Pontian Greeks, as well as the Hellenic peoples in other parts of Asia Minor, renewed their persecutions notwithstanding their promises of political and religious liberty.

In 1908 massacres were begun in various parts of Asia Minor. As a result of the oppression and atrocities of the Turkish Government, the Greek population of Pontus had been reduced at the outbreak of the World War to but slightly more than one-half million. It was shown at the peace conference that the compact Greek population in the Province of Trapezus amounted to but 350,000. Among these people there were 754 Greek schools, with an attendance of more than 37,000 pupils. There were also within this district a large number of Armenians. The latter have been practically exterminated, and the work of exterminating the Greeks of this district is now being continued.

When the Young Turks obtained control of the Government in 1908 there was a change in the policy of dealing with the Christian subjects of the Sultan. They began boycotting the Greeks and Armenians and excited Mussulman mobs to attack and kill the people and destroy their homes. Whatever privileges had been accorded under the pressure of Christian nations were revoked. Thousands of Greeks were forced into "labor battalions," so called, where they speedily lost their lives. Gen. von Sanders Pasha, a German officer, aided in the execution of a plan by which the collective annihilation of the inhabitants could be effectuated. This plan was known as "deportation for strategic reasons." It was applied during the Balkan Wars, but when the World War began it was extensively employed in all parts of Asia Minor where there were Greek populations. Under this plan the Christian population were driven from their homes into the waste and desert lands of Asia Minor, where they were left to perish for want of food and from the inclemencies of the weather, or to fall victims to the murderous assaults of irregular troops and bandits and savage Kurds who infested the mountains and the plains. Under this plan more than 1,500,000 Christian Greeks and Armenians were destroyed. Their bleached bones lie in the mountain passes and on the deserts and plains of Anatolia. Their blood which drenched the soil cries aloud for vengeance.

In addition to the hundreds of thousands thus destroyed, tens of thousands of the males were forced into the army or into the "labor battalions," and it is known that most of them came to untimely ends.

When Turkey signed an armistice the persecutions which had continued up until that time ceased. The military and political authorities undoubtedly believed that if they continued this exterminating policy the dictated terms of the peace conference would be more severe. They hoped by an abandonment of their cruel policy to find some little favor in the eyes of the conquering nations. But after the treaty of Sevres was signed, and it appeared that some of the European powers were indifferent to the execution of its terms, and when Mustapha Kemal became powerful enough to attack the treaty, to violate its terms, and to wage war upon Greece, there was a revival of the cruelties and persecutions not only of the Pontian Greeks but of all the Christian peoples within the Turkish territory.

These renewed persecutions by Kemal Pasha led the Ecumenical Patriarchate to appeal to the English and American churches and also invoke the intervention of the League of Nations, urging that steps be taken to prevent the entire destruction of the Christian populations of Turkey. In addition, the address which I have heretofore called attention to and placed in the RECORD, was issued to the high commissioners of Constantinople.

If time permitted, I could place before the Senate testimony which could not be contradicted, in corroboration of the statements herein made and referred to concerning the past atrocities of the Turks and the present barbarities of the Kemalist régime.

I have here the names of a large number of cities, towns, and villages within the districts of Amissos and Kavzas, together with the number of families that resided therein, all of which have recently been destroyed and the population either massacred or driven into the wilds of Anatolia, where those who have not yet been destroyed must perish during the present winter. The information relative to the destruction of these places was furnished by refugees of Pontus and submitted to the Pontian League of Athens as well as to the Pontian League of New York. The number of places destroyed in the district of Amissos was 59 and the number of families either killed or banished amounted to 2,360. In the district of Kavzas the number of places destroyed was 26 and the number of families either butchered or driven into the mountains and deserts amounted to 1,866. The affidavits state that the number of persons exterminated in these villages amounts to 6,401. Let it be remembered that these barbarities have been recently committed—probably most of them within the past four months—and the work of destruction is still carried on by the Kemalist forces in all parts of Pontus, as well as in all parts of Anatolia where Christian populations are to be found and the Turks are in control. If the French troops and the Greek armies were to be withdrawn the entire Christian population of Asiatic Turkey would doubtless be exterminated.

Mr. J. Zervos, head of the Hellenic mission of relief to the Greeks in Pontus, Caucasus, and Southern Russia, made a report to the Philological Society "Parnassos" at Athens on the 18th of October, 1919, showing the work of destruction then being wrought in Pontus by the Turks. In his report he directs attention to a subject to which I have briefly referred in this language:

It is a well-known fact that this large Greek population having a common origin and an unbroken historical continuity from the oldest times to this day, speaks a highly interesting archaic Greek idiom and preserves admirable folk songs, folklore, pure Greek traditions which go as far back as the Byzantine Hellenism and the hoariest antiquity. The local customs are purely Greek; the people are characterized by a strong national consciousness and an earnest patriotism.

He refers to the régime of terror and the sinister activities for the purpose of destroying all traces of Hellenism in the Pontus region. Attention is called to the report of the Metropolitan of Trebizond to the Patriarchate, in which that eminent prelate stated:

While the Greek ecclesiastical authorities of this diocese were doing everything in their power to protect the Mussulman element of the Vilayet of Trebizond and after authority of the Russian Government were reinstalling the same in their homes with great difficulties and underhand opposition, the Turkish Government, at the same time, was wresting my flock from their homes, driving them cattle-like across impassable mountains in the heart of a severe winter—

This ecclesiast also refers to the persecutions following the retreat of the Russians and declares that they were—carried out with increased fury by the very Turks who had received protection and all sorts of benefits at the hands of the Greeks during the Russian occupation.

The Rev. Panaretos, formerly abbot of the Monastery of St. John of Vazelon, who traveled extensively through the whole of Pontus early in 1919, at the request of the committee of the Pontus Greeks, in order to obtain information concerning conditions, states that the diocese of Amassia before the war had a population of 136,768, with 393 schools and 12,360 pupils and 493 teachers, 498 churches, two bishops, 19 suffragans, and 518 priests, and that at the time of his visit 72,395 of this number had been deported or exiled, 70 per cent of whom died in exile or during their deportation. He further says that less than 30 per cent of the deported ones had returned to their devastated homes after the armistice. He also states that 140 villages had been completely destroyed in the same section, that the Greek village of Cadikeuy, numbering 3,640 souls before deportation had been enforced, at the time of his visit had only 810 inhabitants, and there remained but 100 houses out of 450, and of the former number many were partly destroyed.

He further states in his report that he visited Ordou, in the diocese of Neokaisarea, which numbered before the war 14 towns, 166 villages, 1 secondary school, 18 grammar schools, 173 primary schools, and a Greek population of 87,457. At the time of his visit 25,000 of this number had been deported, mainly from the communities along the coast, into the interior, and 2,700 had been taken to Russia. This prelate declares that the persecution was still raging and that the "loss of life and property was appalling." In those places where deportation had not been ordered the loss of life was great, and 50 per cent of the Greek population had died as a result of the hardships, beatings, and imprisonment to which they had been subjected by the Turkish gendarmerie and officials who terrorized the country.

Referring to that part of the coast visited by him he states that "all trace of the once flourishing villagers has disappeared. Out of the 25,000 deported only 6 per cent of the villagers and 35 per cent of the townspeople have been saved, mere shadows in rags and living witnesses of Turkish barbarism. Throughout the diocese 20 priests were shot or hanged or burnt or buried alive." This reverend man declares that "in the midst of this desolation the Greek race shows its vitality; a community has again been started, schools have been opened, orphanages founded where the orphans—victims of the persecution—find shelter. The orphanage of the community cares for 106 orphans, and their number is steadily increasing. The central committee for relief to the Greek deportees had sent from Constantinople up to the time of our arrival at Ordou Ltqs. 1,500, and the American Committee for Relief in the Near East had given Ltqs. 3,300. The Greek Red Cross has also helped in the way of medicines and clothing."

Senators will remember that these conditions existed early in 1919. The persecutions have continued since that period, and, as I have stated, under the Kemalist régime they have been more violent and deadly than before. Rev. Panaretos further states in his report that on the 17th of April, 1919, he called at Poulandjak, a Greek town which before the war numbered 3,600 inhabitants, with numerous villages in close proximity. The inhabitants of this small section had been compelled to go into exile in 1917, and that after the armistice only 1,500 were alive to return. Those who did return found their houses destroyed and all of the Greek villages in ruins. However, with courage the survivors began the work of reconstruction, opened an orphanage, formed a community, elected their elders and school board, and founded a charitable society which at the time the reverend father was there was organizing various forms of entertainment for the benefit of the orphanage and the suffering people.

From this scene of desolation he went to Kerassound, an extensive diocese, which before the war contained 2 towns, 14 small towns, 266 villages, with a total Greek population of 167,450. He states that of this number 45,000 were compelled during the armistice to seek refuge in Russia and more than 90,000 were deported by the Turks into the interior of Asia Minor. He declares that 80 per cent of the deportees died of hunger, hardship, and cruel treatment, and that only 7,500 at the time of his visit had returned. Many were hanged without cause, large numbers butchered in cold blood by the Turkish gendarmes and soldiers, and hundreds murdered by Turkish refugees. Every Greek village in the district had been destroyed, many of them being razed to the ground.

Mr. Zervos in his report refers to the fiendish methods employed to exterminate Hellenism in Asia Minor. He states that the Turks deported and exiled the Greeks during the winter, denying them any food or clothing, and the soldiers and officials convoying the deportees and the exiles refused to permit their victims to camp near inhabited places, their object being to expose them to cold and hunger in order that their death might more quickly be brought about. He calls attention to the fact that little children and the old, infirm, and sick were abandoned in the ravines and the woods, where they died either of hunger and exposure or from the bayonets of the Turks. "At every step the traveler now finds the skeletons of Greeks who thus suffered martyrdom."

Those who read these reports will be filled with horror and indignation. It seems as though every device of refined cruelty was employed by the heartless and bloodthirsty Turks to inflict suffering upon the unhappy people who were their victims. Mr. Zervos states that of the 600,000 Pontian Greeks who were living in their homes at the beginning of the European war, at least 235,000 were butchered or came to their death through famine and hardship following deportations and that 80,000 succeeded in escaping to the Caucasus, where they are refugees and suffering a wretched existence. Senators will remember that Mr. Zervos speaks of conditions prior to his report in October, 1918; Turkish atrocities have destroyed thousands of starving and exiled victims. It is certain that most of the Greek population of Pontus who were still living when Mr. Zervos made his report have been destroyed by the Turks and the Kemalist forces.

In 1919 the Greek Patriarchate published to the world a report of 147 pages, which I have before me, in which there is much detailed information concerning the persecutions of the Greek population of Turkey between 1914 and 1918. The American people and all Christian nations should become familiar with this report, as well as with the unimpeachable testimony which establishes the cruelties and atrocities which have been inflicted upon the unhappy Christian people of Asia Minor. The unspeakable acts of cruelty are so revolting that one can not read these pages except with horror. The savagery, the beastly and horrible cruelty upon the part of the Turks scarcely find parallel in the darkest and foulest days that have come to man. My eye rests upon these lines, which refer to a small district near the monastry of Vazelon:

The metropolitan of Rodopolis, Monseigneur Cyril, wrote on the 12th of November, 1918, the following:

"One shudders at the accounts given of the atrocities committeed and the number of victims. No less than 487 persons, who had hidden in the mountains, grottos, and subterraneous caves, were savagely massacred. Among these victims were 14 young girls who had sought refuge in the monastery of Vazelon, where the Turks, after first violating these unfortunate creatures, mutilated them in a horrible way."

Churches and monasteries where women and children sought refuge were invaded and after pillaging and plundering everything portable the women and children were butchered or burned in the flaming buildings. The Turkish commander of the Kayoler-Han post ordered the monastery of Vazelon to be surrounded, and all who were therein—the monks, 780 Greek refugees, and 29 Armenians—to abandon it, refusing the pleas of the inviolability of the monastry, which was protected by imperial decree. The commander then ordered troops to enter, all furniture and other treasures, including the archives, Bibles, and manuscripts, were either carried away or burned, and the church desecrated and destroyed. The nuns of a convent situated a short distance from the monastery were carried away and met with a most horrible end.

Out of 1,250 inhabitants of Elevi only 150 survived. From the district of Tripoli, numbering 30,000 people, only 1,500 to 2,000 escaped destruction. Let me read from page 126 of this report:

Speaking of the community of Ounia, it is stated that after deportations began in 1917 the gendarmes beat and plundered the inhabitants and scattered them between Castmbol, Zile, and other parts. Many Christians, in order to escape from the tyranny of the Turks, took shelter in the woods, where they dwelt for several months. Three hundred of them, in a most piteous state, went to Trebizond and thence to Russia.

A letter written from Ounia states:

Shortly before our expulsion a detachment of troops arrived. Ismail Bey, a Circassian, was at the head of these savage hordes of Kurds. After having brought as many men as he could together, he shut them up in a house and dispatched them by groups of two or three at a time to the slaughterhouse he had prepared beforehand.

What happened to the women and children after that is also beyond description. All the nice-looking women and girls belonging to these unfortunate peasants were raped and dishonored. Some managed to flee to the mountains, part were saved; others died of hunger; and others returned again, only to be murdered. But even the men, women, and children who survived did not fare much better. At first they were dispersed to the surrounding Turkish villages, where they were treated as slaves. A few months later on they were exiled to the interior of Asia Minor.

In the prosperous community of Rize the Turks destroyed all Greek property and massacred and deported all Greeks except four.

In concluding this report, the Patriarchate states that when it submitted complaints to the sovereign nothing resulted. Continuing, the Patriarchate appeals to the great powers—demanding protection and intervention in the name of humanity, in that of civilization and justice, in the name of the many treaties whereby the existence of the Christians in the world has been guaranteed, beseeching them to prevent the accomplishment of that which 11 centuries of tyranny never dared to dream of.

In the issue of the New York Times, bearing date of December 11, 1921, there appears a dispatch from Paris referring to the Turkish nationalist plans and activities in Cilicia. The dispatch is based upon a statement appearing in the Eclair, a paper whose editor is said to be a close personal friend of Premier Briand. The Paris dispatch proceeds:

The story is more surprising because it seems to support the British contention that the accord signed last October between the Angora Government and M. Franklin Bouillon for France would imperil the safety not only of Christians but of proally Mussulmans in the territories evacuated by France.

It will be recalled by Senators that there was criticism in the United States and doubtless in certain parts of Europe because of the apparent purpose of France to repudiate the Sevres treaty and to enter into a separate agreement with the Kemalist Government. Great Britain, as indicated, did not look with favor upon this course. I am not able to state that Great Britain desired to adhere to the Sevres treaty, although my impression is that the British Government would have been entirely satisfied to join with the allied nations who participated in the treaty of Sevres in compelling the Turks to execute its provisions. The Eclair's account of what is now occurring is as follows:

Already the Kemalists are sending numerous convoys of Christians through Sivas toward we know not what place of exile or death. All the privileges accorded by the Sultans to the Christians have been taken away and those promised by the Kemalists have not been accorded. At Adana, in Cilicia, and even on the frontiers of Syria an organization called the Club of National Vengeance, which is an offshoot of the Club of Union and Progress, is showing the greatest hostility not only against Christians but also against those Mussulmans who made the mistake of believing in French protection. Large numbers of these Mussulmans are taking refuge in Syria and are protesting that they should have been placed under the protection of the Sultan when the French withdrew from the district and not given over to the Kemalist brigands.

The article further continues and quotes from Kemalist newspapers, all of which are printed in red ink, and which indicate that Kemal Pasha is counting on recruiting 50,000 fresh soldiers from Cilicia to aid in an offensive against the Greeks. Reference is also made to another advantage which the Kemalists expect to derive from the agreement with France, namely, that they will be able to utilize the railway systems of southern Asia Minor for military operations and make Adana a base from which they can conduct an aggressive war. This article condemns the French agreement with the Kemalists and points to the dangers which it lays upon the French protectorate of Syria.

I call particular attention to the statement that not only is there the greatest hostility toward Christians but also such Mussulmans as believed that the French would afford protection to them against their coreligionists. It would appear from the situation here indicated that the Kemalists, relieved from further military operations, offensive or defensive, against the French, consider themselves free to strengthen their military forces for the purpose of driving the Greek forces from Asia Minor.

This account also, it seems to me, supports the view that the Kemalist régime intends to exterminate all Christian peoples in Asia Minor. They have practically destroyed the Armenians in Asiatic Turkey and have either murdered or driven from their homes nearly a million Pontian Greeks. In other parts of Asia Minor there were hundreds of thousands of Greeks residing at the outbreak of the World War, and large numbers of them have been deported and murdered and tens of thousands have been compelled to take refuge in the regions of Smyrna and in Greece proper. If the allied nations had enforced the treaty of Sevres, the atrocities now being committed would never have occurred. I fear that the alied nations, parties to this treaty, have failed to perform the high and responsible duty resting upon them in dealing with the defeated Turkish Empire and its nationals.

The civilized world insisted that there should no longer be Turkish rule in any part of Europe, that the Turkish State should be limited to certain portions of Asia Minor, generally described as Anatolia, and that it should give guaranties for the protection of the Christian peoples living within its borders. It would appear that jealousies entered into the counsels of the allied nations participating in the treaty of Sevres, as a result of which, if they did not abandon the treaty, they failed to enforce its terms.

This situation was taken advantage of by the reactionary forces in Turkey, who gave support to Kemal Pasha and boldly announced their repudiation of the treaty of Sevres and their purpose to regain territory which had been awarded to Greece and to establish Turkish authority throughout Asia Minor as well as Thrace and constitute Turkey a strong military power. As I have indicated, the program of these reactionary elements contemplated the destruction of the Armenian Republic, which, as I have stated, is a fait accompli, and also the extermination of the Pontian Greeks and the destruction of Hellenic peoples in various parts of Anatolia. The Kemalists, or the Nationalists, as they are called, avowed their purpose to drive the Greek Army from Asia Minor, where it is seeking to protect the Greek interests in the vilayets of Aidin and Brussa and to subject the more than 1,100,000 Greeks residing within such territory to the degrading, oppressive, and brutal tyranny of Turkish rule.

The treaty of Sevres, as stated in the resolution which I offered and to which I have called the attention of the Senate, provides for full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Turkey, without regard to birth, race, nationality, or religion. The allied nations who wrote this treaty knew that within Asiatic Turkey, as its lines had existed for many years, there were a large number of Armenian Christians and Nestorians—who, as Senators know, are Christians—and also 1,700,000 Greeks.

At the peace conference at Paris in 1919 the undisputed evidence showed that the Hellenic nation was distributed substantially as follows:

Four million three hundred thousand inhabitants within the kingdom of Greece, as its boundaries were then prescribed; 151,000 in northern Epirus and Albania; 731,000 in Thrace, including those within the city of Constantinople; 43,000 in Bulgaria, not including the many thousands who were annexed to Bulgaria by the treaty of Bucharest; 2,000,000—approximately—in Asia Minor; 102,000 in the Dodecanesus; 235,000 in the island of Cyprus. In addition there were more than 1,000,000 distributed in various lands. In Egypt and in the rest of Africa, 150,000; North and South America, 450,000; and in southern Russia, 400,000. Of the 731,000 Greeks residing in Thrace and in the region of Constantinople, more than 364,000 were residents of Constantinople.

At that time the entire population of Constantinople numbered but 1,173,670, of whom only 449,114 were Turks. The Armenians, Greeks, and other Christian peoples therefore greatly outnumbered the Turks, so that it can not be said that Constantinople is a Turkish city. More than 230 schools were conducted in Constantinople by the Greeks, with more than 30,000 pupils; moreover, as Senators know, this famous and important city was and is the seat of the Greek Ecumenical Patriarchate.

If Senators will examine the map of Greece and the Ægean Sea and Asia Minor, they will discover numerous islands separating Greece from the Asiatic shore. These islands are inhabited by Greeks and in every way are a part of Greece. Geographically and ethnically they constitute a part of the Greek State, and the same may be said of a section of the western part of Asia Minor. The vilayet of Adin and a portion of the vilayet of Brussa have a population of more than 1,200,000 Greeks. They support by their own resources more than 565 churches, 652 schools, and approximately 100,000 pupils. The neighboring islands, which geographically and economically constitute a part of Greece, contain more than 100,000 inhabitants and constitute a chain binding the mainland of Greece and the Hellenic territory of Asia Minor. The German geographer Philippson, in his work entitled "Reisen und Forschungen im westlichen Kleinasien," states that—

> Asia Minor is separated right in the middle by a great natural frontier; on the one side an inclosed plateau of an almost Asiatic nature, on the other an Ægean land exactly like the Greek regions and closely connected by nature and history with the sea and with Greece just beyond the sea. The result is that now, as in the past, Asiatic civilization reigns in the interior while Greek culture prevails in western Asia Minor.

He further states that in western Asia Minor there is a configuration which is quite distinctive, that there has been a "sinking away of the terrain in a recent geological epoch," and that this peculiarity is recognized in Greece, so that the two may be considered as constituting but one geographical entity—that of the Ægean.

Permit me to add that notwithstanding the 500 years of Turkish oppression, the Greeks of Asia Minor, and particularly of the two Provinces just referred to, have maintained their language, religion, culture, national consciousness, and high ideals. Within these vilayets illustrious men of ancient Greece were born. Homer was born in what we call Asia Minor, and many of the heroic figures of Greece who added to the glory and fame of Hellas prior to the Christian era were natives of the western part of Asia Minor, which then constituted a part of the Greek city States. Let me add that there are fewer Turks within this section of Asia Minor than there are Greeks. It is inconceivable that this part of Asia Minor should again be brought under Turkish rule. It was a part of Hellas nearly 3,000 years ago. It is essentially Greek and should constitute a part of the Greek State.

If it be contended that there are a large number of Mohammedans within this territory, it may be answered that within the Turkish State, as delimited by the Sevres treaty, there were approximately as many Greeks. Because of their scattered condition and the fact that, aside from those who lived in Pontus, the great majority of them reside in parts of Anatolia in which the Turkish population greatly preponderates, it is obvious that they could not be attached to the Greek State. It was these unfortunate people the commissioners had in mind when the Sevres treaty was drawn; and the provisions of the treaty, calling for the protection of all inhabitants of Turkey, "regardless of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion," were designed to protect them from further Turkish oppression.

The apparent repudiation by the allied nations of the treaty of Sevres is, in my judgment, a most unfortunate thing. The allied nations, as well as Christian peoples everywhere, should be interested in the protection of Hellenism. A powerful, progressive Greek State is in the interest of the peace of Europe as well as in the interest of civilization. The Orient is in a condition of ferment. The Mohammedan population of Asia Minor, India, and Western Asia is in liquid form and subject to irresponsible and revolutionary movements. The more than 8,000,000 Ottoman Turks constitute a menace to Greece and to the Balkan States. Greece should be fortified and strengthened. Her important interests in the Levant should be recognized. She should be made a citadel of strength against which any revolutionary or barbarous force from the East might beat in vain.

And a strong and powerful Greece will hold in check any military movement that might be fomented in Bulgaria. I submit that the allied nations, as well as this Nation, should be more interested in Greece and its welfare than in Turkey, who was our bitter and relentless foe, or Bulgaria, whose legions strengthened the Central Empires when they sought the control of Europe and the defeat of this Republic.

I protest against a policy which weakens Greece and strengthens Turkey. I express my profound regret at the action of France in entering into the Angora agreement with the Kemalist régime, which inevitably will result in strengthening the nationalistic movement in Turkey and weakening Greece. It will be regarded by the Kemalists as a retreating movement upon the part of the allied nations and a confession that the Turks may continue their atrocities and foul and hideous crimes and wage relentless war upon the Greek forces engaged in protecting those parts of Asia Minor which geographically and ethnically are a part of Greece and which should constitute a part of the Greek State.

It would appear as though Turkey was to emerge from the war victorious. If she may force her authority over Smyrna and contiguous territory, why may she not demand that Turkish sovereignty shall not be extinguished in Constantinople or any part of Thrace? Indeed, there are signs which portend a purpose upon the part of the Turks to wrest Thrace from Greece, and there are many symptoms of a movement with which Bulgaria is sympathetic to extinguish the authority of Greece over every portion of Thrace. The situation in Asia Minor and in the region of the Ægean Sea is not reassuring, and the allied nations should take immediate steps to enforce the Sevres treaty and support Greece in her efforts to defend her rights and protect the Christian people in Asia Minor.

The recognition by France of the Kemalist régime even as the de facto Government of Turkey was, in my opinion, most unfortunate and may prove the contributing cause of a most deplorable development. Article 151 of the treaty of Sevres provides "that the powers shall consult with the council of the League of Nations upon measures necessary to guarantee the provisions of the treaty," which provides for the protection of Christian minorities within the Turkish State. The guaranties provided have been disregarded, and the Christian nations with apparent unconcern witness the destruction of cities and towns inhabited by Greeks and Armenians and the execution of an infamous plan to work their complete extermination.

I appreciate that our Nation was not a party to the treaty of Sevres. If our Government had declared war, as it should have done against the Turkish Empire and the Kingdom of Bulgaria, we would have had a voice in the treaty which dealt with these belligerent powers. The United States could then have insisted as a matter of right upon the enforcement of the treaty and demanded of Turkey that it protect the Christian peoples within its borders and afford to them the guaranties of the treaty.

Senators will perceive that in the resolution which I have offered and which I shall ask the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider there is no proposed interference with other nations. But I submit that though we did not declare war upon Turkey, the interests of Turkey and the Central Empires were so inseparably intertwined that in dealing with Austria and Germany we are not to be precluded from at least calling the attention of the allied nations to a pitiful, inhuman, and tragic situation occasioned by Turkey and to consequences which might eventuate in a recrudescence of hostilities which indirectly, if not directly, would affect the United States and the peace of the world.

But I submit that there would be no transgression of the most punctilious regard for international proprieties if the Chief Executive of the United States should direct the attention of the European powers, and particularly the allied nations, to the conditions in Turkey and to the inhuman and brutal treatment to which the Christian peoples of Turkey are subjected. Nor can there be any impropriety in our Government appealing to the League of Nations, which is linked with the Sevres treaty, with a view to securing its interposition to prevent further bloodshed and massacre.

This Nation has often lifted its voice against cruelty and oppression and for the protection of helpless minorities. Resolutions have been adopted by one or both branches of Congress protesting against the wrongs to which political and religious minorities in governments have been subjected. But even if there should be no Executive appeal, Congress should declare its abhorrence of the ruthless exterminating policy which is being pursued by the Turks against unoffending Christians and should by appropriate resolution call the attention of the civilized world to the atrocities committed by the Turks upon helpless peoples.

Turkey should be made aware of the fact that this Republic looks with horror upon her merciless and bloody acts and will refuse to sustain any relations with a people or a government stained with innocent blood and covered with infamous crimes.

It has been stated that the Kemalist régime contemplates sending representatives to America, either to secure recognition at the hands of this Republic or to float loans to enable Kemal Pasha's government to meet its obligations and to maintain it in authority and power. Even the suggestion that America should receive such representatives or that anywhere in this broad land a single penny could be obtained by the Turkish Government or by the Kemalist régime should be an insult to the American people.

If the European nations will not interpose to save from destruction the Christian populations of Asia Minor, then this Nation and the churches and the public-spirited and philanthropic people throughout our land should lift their voices in solemn protest against the consummation of this wicked purpose; they should arouse civilized nations from their lethargy and put in operation such influences and moral forces as will bring fear to the hearts of the Kemalist forces and compel the renunciation of their purpose to destroy the Christian inhabitants of Asiatic Turkey and to regain authority over territory to which they are not entitled and which under every principle of right and justice should not constitute a part of any Turkish State.

Mr. President, there is another matter relevant to the present discussion which I shall briefly refer to. The bolshevik government of Moscow has been rendering material aid to the Kemalist régime and now has its representatives in various parts of Anatolia. The evidence is conclusive that the bolsheviks have been aiding in various ways the Nationalist government in its efforts to destroy the Sevres treaty and to regain possession of Asia Minor, if not all territory within the Turkish Empire as it existed at the outbreak of the war.

At a conference of communists, at which representatives from Turkey and other Near East countries and also bolshevik Russia were present, held at Batum some months ago, the revolutionary doctrines of the third internationale were emphasized and encouragement given to the Ottoman Turks to wage war against the allied nations. The bolsheviks joined in the persecution of the Armenians and materially contributed to the destruction of the Armenian Republic. They sent representatives among the Mohammedans in various parts of Asia Minor and as far as India for the purpose of provoking the masses to revolt against constituted authorities and to wage war against what they denominated "capitalistic governments."

If it had not been for the help given by the bolsheviks and the direct, if not the indirect, aid received by the Kemalist forces from a number of the European nations, in my opinion the Kemalist movement would not have assumed its present proportions, and the terms of the Sevres treaty, perhaps with some modifications, would have been accepted by all parties to it, and the Christian populations of Asia Minor would not have suffered the persecutions, the horrible and decimating effects of which I have so imperfectly described.

Undoubtedly, if the Sevres treaty is wholly repudiated and the Kemalist movement triumphs and the allied nations offer no restraints to the licentious and blood-thirsty purposes of the Turks, they will, after destroying the Christian populations of Asia Minor, demand the return of Thrace, the possession and control of Constantinople, and the recognition of that ancient city as the capital of the Turkish Empire. Bulgaria will be encouraged to make war upon Greece and will be promised a division of Thrace in the event of an allied triumph between Turkey and Bulgaria.

Mr. President, Constantinople must never be returned to Turkish control; and the crescent flag which has represented lust and rapine and murder and crimes unspeakable must not be permitted to float upon European soil.

I shall not further speak of Constantinople and the disposition which should be made of it, as I have heretofore expressed, on the floor of the Senate and by resolutions which I have offered, my views with respect to this subject. But I do protest against any course which will deprive Greece of western Thrace—that portion of Thrace which she is now in possession of and which is subject to her political control.

I have, upon a number of occasions, been asked to state some of the many reasons which call for the award to Greece of what is known as western Thrace; that is to say, all of Thrace except that portion of ancient Thrace lying to the east of the west boundary of Chatalja. A suitable reply calls for some historical consideration. Modern Thrace comprises the region extending along the Ægean Sea and Sea of Marmora, from the eastern boundary of Macedonia to Constantinople on the Bosporus. Thrace touches on the east the Black Sea, and extends northward to the Balkan plateau. Western Thrace is sometimes called Bulgarian Thrace merely because Bulgaria obtained possession of the same at the close of the late Balkan wars. The treaty between the allied and associated powers, not including the United States and Bulgaria, which was prepared in Paris in September, 1919, provides for the cession of Western Thrace to the allied and associated powers. Greece became possessed of western Thrace because ethnically, geographically, culturally, and by every standard of justice she was entitled to an award constituting it a portion of her territory.

Let me briefly direct attention to the historical relations of Thrace, as well as its present ethnographical status.

The original inhabitants of the Greek peninsula, as well as of the country lying between the Adriatic and Ægean and Black Seas, were allied to the Hellenic tribes and spoke a language which was related to the Hellenic dialects. The same is true of the indigenous inhabitants of western Asia, or Asia Minor. The Greek peninsula proper included the Pelopenesus and the upper Provinces of Thessaly and Epirus. Macedonia, which bordered these on the north, was in the earlier days of Greek history regarded as a sort of frontier kingdom which was not a part of Greece proper. The country lying to the north of Macedonia and Epirus, stretching from the Adriatic to the Bosporus and skirting the Ægean Sea, was known as Thrace and Illyricum, Illyricum being situated upon the Adriatic and comprising what is now Albania and Serbia, and Thrace occupying the country to the east lying generally between the Danube River and the Ægean Sea and extending to the Bosporus and Black Seas. The oldest dialect of these countries which has survived is presently spoken in Albania. It is clearly related to the Greek tongue and bears evidences of being of greater antiquity than the Greek. It is also known that the ancient Illyrians were related in speech and blood to the original tribes of Italy. The original language and culture of Thrace therefore was Hellenic, and the fundamental Hellenic character has persisted until this day.

Philip the Second, King of Macedonia, reigned in the fourth century, B. C., from 359 to 336. He was an Hellene by birth and tongue, although as King of Macedonia he was regarded as an outsider by the other Greeks. Philip brought Greece into his domain. One of his early accomplishments was to annex Chalcidice, the country on the Ægean lying to the east of what is now Salonica, to the Macedonian kingdom. Philip also brought the towns in Thrace under his dominion and thus accomplished the political unity of the Hellenic cities and peoples. Philip's son and successor reigned from 336 to 325 B. C. Upon the death of Alexander his kingdom was divided among four of his generals. To Seleucus Nicator was assigned Thrace, together with territories in Asia Minor. Lysimachus obtained possession of Greece proper. The Roman conquest of the East was even then imminent. Some of the Greek cities had assisted Carthage in her wars with Rome, and the Romans were determined to put an end to the Greek power. In 146 B. C. Macedonia became a Roman province, and the Roman dominion was within a short time extended over the whole of Greece and Thrace and also over Asia Minor. The Romans, however, were satisfied with exercising political control in Thrace. All they demanded was allegiance to the Roman authority. There was liberty of speech and religion and a free field for the development and extension of Greek culture. At the beginning of the Christian era the Greek language was spoken in Thrace and in western Asia Minor. The Epistles of the Apostle Paul were written in Greek and addressed to the Greek communities in both Asia Minor and Macedonia.

In 395 A. D., the Roman Empire was divided by the Emperor Theodocius between his two sons, Arcadius and Honorious. The seat of the eastern empire which was assigned to Honorious was the Greek city of Byzantium at the eastern end of Thrace on the Bosporus. The Emperor Constantine had already established Byzantium as the new capital of the Roman Empire, which was named Constantinople in his honor. Indeed, Byzantium was to be the capital of a new Christian empire, having its seat in the center of Greek culture and of the Greek Christian communities, which were in fact the beginning and foundation of the Christian Church. The Byzantine Empire flourished for a thousand years until the incursion of the Turks into Constantinople in 1453 and their subjugation of the whole Balkan and Illyrian region, including Greece itself and the Ægean islands. The seat of the Turkish power was then established in Constantinople, and for more than five centuries the Turks have maintained here the capital of their constantly diminishing empire.

Greece itself was the first of the Turkish Provinces in Europe to regain its independence. The independent Greece, however, did not even include Macedonia. In the years since she gained her independence, however, one of the principal aims of the Greeks has been to liberate and redeem the ancient Hellenic lands and peoples from the tyrannies of the Turks. The liberation of the unredeemed Greeks has been the national passion of the free Greeks not only in the mother country but in all the world.

The Turkish Provinces of Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Rumania attained under the arrangements of the powers at the congress at Vienna either an independent status or paid only a nominal tribute to the Sultan. Until the recent Balkan wars, however, Turkey retained control of the Vardar Valley, extending from Saloniki to the Danube, including at its northern extremity the sanjak of Novibazzar, which intervened between Montenegro and Serbia, and gave the Sultan control of the communications between the Danubian frontier and Saloniki and Constantinople. Macedonia, Albania, and Thrace remained under the Turkish thraldom. Bulgaria declared her independence of Turkey under her own Czar and thus severed the bond which nominally connected her with the Sultan. The Balkan wars were fought for the liberation of Macedonia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Epirus, and Thrace from the Turkish power. The final result was that Turkey in Europe was restricted to the residue of the Province of Adrianople, lying east of the Maritza River, together with the city of Constantinople. Greece obtained a large part of Macedonia, including the Ægean coast at Saloniki and Kavalla; Serbia was extended to include the sanjak of Novibazzar, and extended southward through the Vardar Valley to the Greek frontier behind Saloniki; Albania was removed from the sovereignty of Turkey and given an independent status; and Bulgaria obtained, besides a very large part of Macedonia, its northern part, that part of Thrace which extends along the Ægean Sea from the Mesta to the Maritza River. In the recent war both Turkey and Bulgaria joined the enemies of the allied and associated powers and shared defeat with Germany and her allies. Bulgaria was required to renounce western Thrace to the allied and associated powers, and the Turkish domains in Europe, including eastern Thrace and Constantinople, were placed in the hands of the victorious nations. These events brought modern Thrace in its entirety into the hands of the allied and associated powers, to be disposed of according to the interests and rights of the inhabitants and upon such principles as would promote peace and a permanent settlement.

The principal elements of the population in Thrace are Turkish and Greek. These terms have, however, a religious as well as an ethnological signification. In the five centuries of Turkish domination thousands of persons of Hellenic blood have been converted by force or fraud to the Moslem religion. Thus the Albanians, though nominally of the Mohammedan creed, are by blood related to the indigenous inhabitants of the country, and are not Turks by blood or race. The same is true of thousands of the inhabitants of Asia Minor, and is doubtless true of many of the inhabitants of Thrace. In the Turkish vilayet of Adrianople, which includes the whole of modern Thrace, exclusive of Constantinople, less than one-half of the inhabitants are Turks, and this word must be understood as denoting those who are of the Moslem faith rather than of the Turkish race. The Greeks constitute a full one-third of the population and the Bulgarians but one-tenth. In Constantinople, including the suburb of Chatalja, and excluding Scutaria, which lies across the Bosphorus in Asia, the Turks constitute but one-third of the population, and of the non-Turkish elements the Greeks have over one-half. Although the Bulgarians have endeavored to increase the number of their people in western Thrace by persistent colonization, the number of Bulgarians is relatively inconsequential. There are a large number of Turks in Thrace and Constantinople, but these, as stated above, constitute less than one-half of the population of Thrace and only one-third of the population of Constantinople. In recent years the tendency has been for the Turkish population formerly in the Balkans to concentrate in that part of Thrace which remained under Turkish sovereignty.

There has been a constant migration into Thrace from the various countries of the Balkans. There has, therefore, been an artificial concentration of Moslems in Thrace, and yet the Moslems are in the minority. Generally speaking, the non-Turkish elements are Christian and Jewish in religion, and have common understandings and interests which bind them together. The Turks have demonstrated by their administration of non-Turkish countries that they are clearly unfit and incompetent to govern non-Turkish nations. The Turkish law, moreover, is not suitable or fit to be applied in civilized or Christian communities. There are many thousands of Jews settled at Saloniki or at other ports of Greece. The Greeks, moreover, have been in communication with the Jews and Turks for centuries. I think the fact is that there is but little, if any, antipathy on the part of either Turks or Jews against the Greeks in Thrace, and it can be asserted with confidence that both Turks and Jews can enjoy and exercise their rights and liberties under Greek law and government. Indeed, the Turks at Adrianople, which was captured by Bulgaria in the last Balkan war and was afterwards reconquered by the Turks, declared an utter abhorrence of being placed under Bulgarian rule, but expressed a willingness to be placed under Greek rule. The Greeks have the same system of law which spread from imperial Rome over the whole of continental Europe and under which all persons, without regard to creed, race, or condition, are protected and vindicated in their personal liberties and rights. And personal liberty, after all, consists essentially in the establishment and administration of law which protects every man in his personal rights and property, all of which constitutes what we call justice. There are, therefore, no proper impediments to the establishment of Greek rule over Thrace.

The Bulgarians have no such interests in Thrace as would warrant, in any view of the case, the extension of Bulgarian political control over any part of Thrace. The Bulgarians do, however, assert that they have need for a commercial outlet upon the Ægean Sea. The port of Dedeagach, in western Thrace, does serve in a very minor way for Bulgarian commerce, but the quantity of Bulgarian commerce passing through this port is relatively unimportant. Bulgaria has two well-developed ports—Burgas and Varna—on the Black Sea. Constantinople itself is an important port for Bulgarian commerce, and Saloniki could serve Bulgarian trade better than any other port on the Ægean. The outlet for Serbian commerce at Saloniki is absolutely essential. Indeed, the principal part of the commerce of Saloniki has its origin or destination in Serbia. Serbia was the ally and friend of Greece and of the allied and associated powers in the late war. Arrangements for the accommodation of Serbian commerce at Saloniki have been concluded, which are altogether adequate and satisfactory to Serbia and which do not interfere in anyway with the political control and authority of Greece at Saloniki. Similar arrangements could be made for the accommodation of Bulgarian commerce at Dedeagach or Saloniki. Bulgaria is certainly not entitled to demand better or more favorable accommodations at the Greek ports on the Ægean than have been accorded to Serbia. Greece should not be required to treat her enemy better than her friend.

I submit that in the interest of justice as well as for the peace of Europe, Thrace, as I have defined it, should constitute an inseparable part of the Greek State, and all conspiracies to return any portion of this territory to Bulgaria or to Turkey should meet with world-wide condemnation. Islamism must not be crowned, and the bloody chariot wheels of the Sultan's authority must never again be permitted to be driven over the prostrate form of this redeemed land with its brave and heroic inhabitants.

Mr. President, I can not forbear making a brief allusion to the recent action of a number of the European powers who desire to deprive Greece of Northern Epirus, which by the law of self-determination as well as all just standards to be applied in marking the boundaries of nations, should constitute a part of the Kingdom of Greece. Northern Epirus, geographically and ethnically, belongs to Greece. With a population of 200,000, 120,000 are Christians and approximately 80,000 Moslems. The Christians demand union with Greece, while the Moslems—or the great majority of them—undoubtedly desire to be united with the Moslem State of Albania. In 1913 the Turks were driven from Northern Epirus by the Grecian armies; and the people, liberated from the oppressive rule to which they had so long been subjected, received with the greatest joy their deliverers.

Austria threatened war against Greece, and the government of that State, desiring to avoid further bloodshed, and yielding to the representations of Sir Edward Grey—speaking for Great Britain—evacuated this territory. The Greeks residing in Northern Epirus refused to submit to Albania or Moslem domination, and established a provisional government of their own; and in 1915 Northern Epirus was recognized as Greek territory by the powers, and delegates to the Greek Parliament were elected by its inhabitants. However, since that time the political life of Northern Epirus has been varied and turbulent, and the vicissitudes, political and otherwise, of its people have been painful and, indeed, tragic.

In December, 1919, not all of Northern Epirus, but a substantial portion of it, was awarded to Greece by some of the European powers in a joint note to Italy. As I recall, the United States was a party to this note. The district of Korytsa within Northern Epirus was not adjudicated, but was left for further negotiations between France, Great Britain, and Italy, as well as Greece, and, as I recall, the United States. In January, 1920, an allied note to Jugoslavia recognized Korytsa as Greek territory, and made an award accordingly. Notwithstanding this determination, which was subsequently ratified and approved by the nations referred to, the Albanian Government has, by force and violence, sought to retake possession of the same and subject it to Moslem rule.

Unfortunately, some of the allied nations are not giving sympathetic consideration to the claims of Greece to Northern Epirus, and, indeed, as I am advised, are conniving at a course which will permanently attach this district to Albania.

It is to be regretted that internal controversies are weakening the Greek State. Greece has Moslem foes and, perhaps, other enemies. This fact should promote and establish Greek solidarity and bring into happy accord all elements of this great race.

The Hellenic peoples have a great future before them. A puissant Greek State should be their aim. They have a glorious past; they should seek a more glorious future. All nations pay tribute to what Greece has done for culture, for civilization, and for freedom.

Pericles, to commemorate his brilliant reign, invoked the genius of the immortal Phidias, who, upon the Acropolis, erected a statue of the Jove-born goddess Minerva. In her outstretched hand was placed a beacon light. In the darkness and in the storm that light guided the mariner upon the storm-tossed Ægean Sea and guided his bark to safety. Greece must again lift high the standard of liberty and civilization. Her light must point the way to the nations and peoples in that far-off land. The Greeks everywhere should be dedicated to the cause of freedom; and those within the Greek State, with patriotic devotion, should seek their country's welfare.

And Christian nations everywhere should rejoice in the progress which the Greek State has made since its emancipation from Turkish oppression and give moral and generous support to the aspirations of the Greek people. They should lift up their voices in execration of the hideous crimes of the Ottoman Turks and aid in every movement that will preserve from destruction the small remnants of the Armenian Christians and the Pontian Greeks, as well as other Hellenic peoples scattered throughout Asia Minor.

We are soon to commemorate the birth of the Nazarene. The joy of this holiday season should not close our eyes nor seal our ears to the tragic scenes and the piteous cries beyond the seas. Millions are dying of want and hunger in Russia. Wandering and outcast and persecuted Christians are dying in the mountain fastnesses and in the waste places of Asia Minor. While we are bathed in the sunshine, others are lost in the shadows.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution which I offered some days ago with respect to the atrocities in Pontus, which is now lying upon the table, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask permission to insert in my remarks a copy of the resolution and some excerpts which I have here showing various acts of barbarism, together with some statements from some of the witnesses respecting the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution (S. Res. 193) condemning the persecution of the Greeks of Pontus by Ottoman Turks, and requesting the President to bring the matter to the attention of European powers, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and permission is granted to the Senator to print in the RECORD in connection with his remarks the matter referred to by him.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2790) to authorize the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., to construct a bridge across the Escambia River at or near Century, Fla.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9464) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 9464.

The bill (H. R. 9464) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash., was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as will be seen from the title, the House bill just sent over to the Senate is a bridge bill. A few days ago the Senate passed a similar Senate bill which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREIGHT AND EXPRESS RATES ON FARM PRODUCE, ETC.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, during the past year I have from time to time entered my protest against the excessive freight rates being charged throughout the country, and more particularly the rates that have been imposed upon the people of the State of Florida for their citrus-fruit products and their truck-farm products.

I am not going to make a speech upon this question to-day, but I desire to read into the record a letter that I received this morning from a farmer in my State. In this letter he states:

> I am inclosing to you account sales of a shipment of cabbage I have just shipped to Richmond, Va. Please note what a farmer gets out of this shipment, and then see what the express company gets. Now, I ask you to take up this matter with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and show them how a truck grower can do anything with such express charges. We need some relief. We can not stand such rates.

The account of sales which was sent to me by Mr. A. B. Prevatt, of Seville, Fla., who signs this letter, shows that at Richmond, Va., the commission merchant sold seven crates of cabbage for $34, approximately $5 a crate, which was a reasonably good price for those cabbage to have sold for in the market at Richmond. Charged against that $34 was $22.23 for express; or, in other words, it cost him $3.17 per crate upon his cabbage to ship it from Seville, Fla., which is only about 80 miles below Jacksonville, to Richmond. The commission being deducted, $3.40, left the farmer $8.37 for his seven crates of cabbage. Out of that $8.37 he had to pay the expense of production, he had to pay for the gathering of the cabbage, for crating it, packing it, and hauling it to the station; the consequence being that the farmer, on account of the excessively high express rates, did not receive the cost of production on the seven crates of cabbage which sold in Richmond at a fairly good price, namely, about $5 per crate. It would have been far better for Mr. Prevatt to have let his land stand idle.

Mr. President, unquestionably the farming interests of this country need relief. The Interstate Commerce Commission should enter into a serious investigation of the rates that are being imposed upon the agricultural products of the country.

Certainly some relief should be afforded, not only in the interest of the producer, but in the interest of the consumer. Think of a charge of $3.17 per crate upon cabbage for a haul of not exceeding 750 miles, probably 700 miles.

I merely desired to bring these deplorable conditions to the attention of the Senate. I hope that they may also be considered by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in its investigation of the existing railroad and express rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's farmer should feel good about that shipment. He ought to thank God that he got anything out of it, after it had been shipped on the railroad in these times. I have just heard of a man in Nebraska who shipped a carload of corn—a whole carload of corn—from Verona, Nebr., to Billings, Mont., where they had no corn, and he did not get enough for his carload of corn to pay the freight. He was in debt to the railroad company 51 cents when he got through with the operation. So the Florida man ought to feel glad to think he got out without owing the express company something when he got through with the shipment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, he doubtless was more fortunate than the farmer to whom the Senator makes reference. In the Nebraska case, however, I do not know that the corn sold at a fairly good price in the market. In the case referred to by me the product of the farm sold at a fairly good price in the market, and the producer would have had a reasonable return if it had not been for the excessive and unreasonable express rate of $3.17 per crate.

Mr. NORRIS. The corn sold at the market price, for just as much as anybody's corn would bring in that market, and it was in a better market than if the farmer had shipped it east, because he shipped it to a country which had a failure this year and needed corn very badly. He probably got a little above the market price.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There are a great many cases, of course, which illustrate the necessity and the justice of a rearrangement and a lowering of rates, both express and freight. Many shippers in my State have not received enough money for their products to pay the freight. A good many instances of that kind have been brought to my attention. I had an experience of that kind myself last year.

Mr. NORRIS. Not long ago I read a statement issued by one of the New York banks—I think the Irving National Bank—which issues statements every little while showing the conditions of business, which are very interesting and very instructive. They gave in one of their statements the names of quite a number of producers of different kinds of fruit in Florida, stating that they had shipped to the New York market and sold their fruit on that market, and that when they had paid the freight and the commission they were in debt to some extent on their operations. So some of the Senator's constituents do not come out as well as the cabbage man does. He ought to feel good.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator is no more aware of those conditions than I am. I have received a great many communications from grove people and farmers telling me of actual losses, where the returns were not sufficient to pay the freight; but this particular instance of Mr. Prevatt's is the one last to come to my attention, and this illustrates very plainly that the industry will not stand the rates which are imposed. It illustrates that even when the product brings a reasonable and fair price in the market the producer receives little or nothing, on account of the excessive and exorbitant express charges.

Of course, it might be said by some that the carload rate by freight is cheaper. That is true, although it is excessive; but a large part of the farm products can not be marketed in carload lots, and if you attempt to market them in carload lots, even if the producer has a sufficient crop to market in that way, you do not have a proper diversity of marketing. The matter of proper, intelligent, diversified marketing of our products is one of the great problems of the country. Therefore, there are a great many shipments which have to go in less than carload lots for that reason.

I contend that the rates, generally speaking, are too high, and the producers in my State have suffered very sorely from these excessive rates.

Take, for instance, a carload of oranges. It sells in the market at what is considered a reasonable and fair price, as far as the producer is concerned, if he can get his proper part of the proceeds, and as far as the consumer is concerned; yet after you pay your freight rate of about $400 to $475 a car, your packing charges, and so forth, the producer has very little, if anything, left.

Mr. NORRIS. I think what the Senator says is correct; but he is not an expert, and I am not an expert, and these farmers are not experts; so it does not become us to say that railroad rates are too high. If you ask the railroad people, who are experts, they will say the rates are not high enough, and as bearing that out I have a letter which I received just a few days ago from one of the employees of the Nebraska State railway commission, who is supposed to be an expert. He said in his letter to me that an injunction had just been granted by the United States court enjoining the State commission from decreasing any intrastate rates, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission about the same time issued an order permitting the State commission to increase rates; so that they were in this situation, that the State commission had authority from the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase rates, and they were prohibited by the injunction of the United States court from decreasing rates. While that does not look quite right to us, we can take the word of experts that it is right, and we ought to keep on toiling and keep on working, and get our reward in the next world, if we do not get any profit in this.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course, that is the trouble; we have too many experts. A very forcible illustration was given me by an automobile dealer down at Cocoa, Fla., who is also an orange grower. We were talking about the excessive transportation charges on grove and farm products, and he said, by way of illustration, that he could not understand how it was that he could ship a carload of automobiles, which cost him over $10,000, from Detroit, Mich., to Cocoa, Fla., for about $400, but when he got ready to ship a carload of oranges, which he would sell probably for $1,200 gross, from Cocoa, Fla., to New York, his freight bill was around $500.

I have just little enough expert sense myself to not understand the discrepancy, and why it was they imposed a rate of $400 on that carload of automobiles worth $10,000, but the farmer's products are assessed $500, or a rate of $100 more per car. If that is the result of the work of experts, I think we need to eliminate some experts. If experts, without reason or justice, discriminate against growers and farmers who are the very backbone of the country, then we need a little common sense put into our rate making and less expert injustice and foolishness. In the name of justice and fairness I appeal on behalf of the State of Florida for a reduction of express and freight rates so the people of my State can enjoy the prosperity they deserve and in justice are entitled to.

AGRICULTURAL AND TRANSPORTATION INTERESTS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think it may interest the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] especially, and probably all Senators who are in attendance, to know that some of the representatives of some of the agricultural organizations are entering into a very close relationship with the transportation companies of the country for the "adjustment" of all the ills and complaints which agriculture has suffered at the hands of the railroads.

I do not know whether Senators observed in the newspaper reports of Sunday morning the disclosure of a secret meeting which had been held on December 9, between representatives of the railroads and other great interests and the representatives of some of the agricultural organizations who are accredited as the spokesmen for agriculture in Washington.

I want to bring to the attention of Senators and of the country the information which I gathered from the reports in the press and from other sources pertaining to this important meeting.

My attention was directed to an article in the Washington Post of Sunday, December 18, entitled "Rail Foes End Feuds. Officers of Systems and Shippers to Work in Harmony. Organize Committee Here. Farmers Unite with Steel, Lumber, Coal, and Other Interests." This article was printed in the Post, copyrighted, under the name of Harden Colfax. It begins with this statement:

While the Interstate Commerce Commission is trying to find out whether railroad rates should be reduced or not, and is conducting a general inquiry into the transportation situation on its own account, the railroads and the shippers, which have fought each other for a generation, have quietly and without publicity gotten together and agreed to bury the hatchet. Hereafter, instead of antagonizing each other they will work in harmony and as a team.

Evidently, Mr. President, the attack upon the agricultural bloc, which was inaugurated by a member of the Cabinet of the present administration in a public speech a few days ago, has proven pretty effective.

Some representatives of the agricultural organization appear to have been captured by those who were unduly apprehensive of the activities of the bloc. Their efforts are to be enlisted from this time on for the destruction of that organization known as the agricultural bloc, it appears, by "boring from within."

Listen further to the story recited in the Post of December 18:

A solemn agreement to that effect—

That is, to the effect that there is to be harmony between the farmers and the steel, coal, lumber, and other interests hereafter—was entered into at a meeting here on December 9, news of which was withheld by both sides alike, between a special committee of the Association of Railway Executives, representing the carriers of the entire country, and a selected delegation of the biggest of America's big industries.

Important in its novelty, the meeting was still more important from another standpoint. The farmer, through his delegates, sat down and worked with the manufacturer, the coal operator, the lumber man, and other big business interests which he had for many years considered his oppressors.

In other words the farmer, it appears, is converted, made to see, through some magic or other, that these interests, which he had supposed were hostile to him, are instead his best friends.

Now, that very important announcement in the Post records the further fact that an executive committee was appointed to carry out these agreements. This executive committee, the article states, consists of J. R. Howard, of Chicago, President of the American Farm Bureau Federation; S. J. Lowell, of Fredonia, N. Y., master of the National Grange; J. A. Campbell, of Youngstown, Ohio, president of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.—just think of that gentleman being yoked up with the head of the farm bureau federation!—Ernest T. Trigg, of Philadelphia, president of the National Federation of Construction Industry; Charles Hill, of New York, Southern Pine Sales Corporation; J. D. A. Morrow, of Washington, vice president of the National Coal Association.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] will remember that in the coal investigation conducted by the Committee on Manufactures we became somewhat acquainted with Mr. Morrow. I think in the course of the testimony taken before that committee it appeared that the association which he represented, under a large salary, had been indicted in Indianapolis for violation of the anti-trust law. He is one of the associates of the president of the Farm Bureau Federation. Another is F. R. Todd, of Moline, vice president of the Deere Co.

The article continues:

The executive committee appointed as its counsel James A. Emery, of this city, who is also—

Note that "who is also"— counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers.

Many of the Members of the Senate who recall the investigation conducted by a Senate committee of a corrupt lobby that operated here for many years, will remember that that association in particular was involved in the disreputable business of influencing the election of Members of the Senate and Members of the House who would be useful in serving the National Association of Manufacturers.

Now, Mr. President, that very interesting news article was followed the next day by an editorial in the Washington Post. That editorial was entitled "Railroad-Shipper Protocol." It began as follows:

The announcement that the railroads and the big shippers of the country, the latter including farmers, manufacturers, lumber and coal producers, and others, have come together in a plan for cooperation for the common objective of getting the transportation systems upon a better and more stable basis is most encouraging. * * * The understanding reached promises that the railroads will share with the shippers the financial benefits of all further reduction in the cost of operation which may come to them from lower wages or cheaper materials, and that the shippers on their part will be reasonable in their demands and not attempt to force conditions upon the roads which will be unduly burdensome.

There is to be, it seems, cooperation between these representatives and the railroads in securing reductions of rates, especially through further reductions in the wages of the railway employees.

Mr. President, when we assemble again after the recess which is to occur for the holidays, I shall set myself the task of presenting to the Senate and to the country some data, the result of a very serious study upon my part, bearing upon the subject of the pay of railway employees. I may broaden the discussion somewhat to make it cover the wages of all labor.

I say now that I believe I shall be able to demonstrate that it is economically impossible, without destroying the productiveness of industry, and the home market for American merchants, to lower further the wages of labor. I set myself the task of proving to the Senate and the country that the wages of labor to-day are less than they were at the beginning of this century; that the purchasing power of labor at this moment of time will not command, by a considerable amount, as much of the necessaries of life as was the case 10 years before the beginning of this century. I undertake to say, sir, that no answer can be made to the facts and the arguments which it will be possible to put before the Senate of the United States.

I speak at this moment, sir, for the purpose of issuing a word of admonition to the farmers of the country to beware of that leadership in any of the organizations which are represented here that would shackle them in combination with railroad executives and with the great combinations and trusts of the country, leaving it to that group to determine what is to be the policy of this Government with respect to transportation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator able to give us now any information as to what, if any, agreement was made at the meeting which the Senator has mentioned, participated in by the representatives of agriculture and other business and the railroads?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have been informed, I believe reliably informed, that an agreement was reached between the representatives of certain agricultural organizations, the representatives of the railroad executives, and the representatives of other great business and shipping organizations—lumber, steel, coal, and others such as I have indicated from the excerpts which I have read here—that the organizations representing agriculture should withdraw their support of legislation pending before the Senate or Senate committees for the restoration to the State commissions of the power to regulate State rates; and, moreover, that they should withdraw their support of legislation pending before both House and Senate committees proposing the amendment of the transportation act by striking out that portion of the act which is known as section 15a of the Esch-Cummins law.

Senators who have studied that transportation act will know that by its main provision it imposes upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the obligation to ascertain the aggregate value of the railroad property of the country and to impose upon transportation rates sufficiently high "as near as may be" to make a fair return upon the "aggregate value" of the railway property, and that provision of the Esch-Cummins law required the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a determination of "aggregate value" just as soon as the Esch-Cummins law became a statute.

For days, running through a month's debate, I stood on this floor and protested against that provision of that proposed legislation. I said that there were no facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which would enable them to comply with the terms of that proposed law, to ascertain as soon as that law was passed the aggregate value of the railway property of the country.

Under a law passed by Congress in 1913 the Interstate Commerce Commission is charged with the duty of ascertaining the true and fair value of the railway property. They have made progress. It is one of the greatest economic undertakings in the history of the country. The commission has received tentative findings with respect to certain railroads. Anybody familiar with the work imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by that law knows that, even after they have recorded tentative values upon all of the railroads—and it will be some time in the future before that can be accomplished—the railroads will contest every one of those valuations and that it will be years before, under that law, the legal value of the railway property of the country shall have been ascertained. In the meantime the law passed in 1920 imposes upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the obligation to find out at once the aggregate value of the railway property.

I argued and plead then with the Senate not to adopt that provision, because I said that it would compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to accept the investment accounts or "book value" of the railroads as the standard upon which transportation charges should be based; and that value the Interstate Commerce Commission year after year had discredited and impeached as absolutely unreliable. Everyone who is acquainted with the railroad history of this country knows that from the beginning every railroad that has ever been organized in America has been organized on a basis of tremendous overcapitalization; and that overcapitalization stays to-day in the railroad book valuation just as it was placed there and has accumulated since the beginning. The Interstate Commerce Commission has pointed that out hundreds of times; and yet that was the only tangible basis upon which the commission could act under the Esch-Cummins law.

Oh, it will be said that there is available the result of the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the valuation act. That work, however, had not progressed to the point where it was available as a means of ascertaining the true value. On some of the small roads of the country a tentative valuation has been ascertained under the valuation act, and that valuation, Mr. President, is estimated to be 50 per cent of the capitalization of the roads. This is, of course, a rough estimate, and yet the Interstate Commerce Commission, driven by the Esch-Cummins law which we passed, which required them to find the aggregate value of the railroads, fixed what as the total value of the railroads? They fixed the value of the railroads as being $18,900,000,000 or, in round numbers, $19,000,000,000. Every independent expert who has ever spoken upon that subject, every engineer of authority, every competent man who is not biased, has said for years that there was at least from 40 to 50 per cent of overvaluation in that book value; and yet the valuation of the Interstate Commerce Commission came within about a billion dollars of the total book value of the railroads as fixed by them. So the commission was compelled ultimately to take that enormous valuation as the only basis upon which to fix rates, and those rates have been exacted from the American people since August 26, 1920.

I undertake to say just this on the subject of valuation and its relation to rates at this time: There is in the railroad property of this country an excess capitalization charge of something like six or seven billion dollars.

Mr. President, the trouble with the transportation of this country, in just a word, may be stated as follows: The railroads have an overhead charge for capitalization of from 40 to 45 per cent greater than ever was put into the property, and greater than the property ever can carry. If it be attempted to make the products of the country pay the transportation charges on a valuation of $19,000,000,000, then we have fixed the rate so high as to stall traffic. It is essential to lessen the overhead, or traffic can not move in such a way as to make any adequate return to the producers of this country. Even if we strike out the little proviso which was agreed to be stricken out in the conference to which I have referred—the 5½ to 6 per cent income provision, which expires in any event in March—if we strike that out we have remaining in section 15 the provision that it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates "as near as may be" so as to insure a fair return upon the "aggregate value" of the property.

This valuation, as I have indicated, has been ascertained by the commission in the only manner which the Esch-Cummins law permitted, namely, by accepting the book value or investment accounts of the railroads. So if section 15a be retained in the law the commission must keep the rates as near as may be to the present rates. The attempt to make the present rates pay 5½ to 6 per cent was a failure, because the traffic could not make the return. The commission will have to lower the rates somewhat, but they will still struggle with that provision left in the Transportation Act, as has evidently been agreed to by this combination that has been set up here without consulting the farmers who are paying the expenses of the heads of these organizations. So there will continue to be imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the obligation to fix rates which will pay a return on this overcapitalization, and they will be compelled to accept the valuation fixed by the railroads themselves largely in their investment accounts, in round numbers, $19,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I merely wanted this evening, before we concluded the session prior to the Christmas recess, to let the farmers who are putting up the money to pay the expenses of the Grange and the Farm Bureau know what is going on here, and to warn them that their representatives here are making secret deals with the heads of these great combinations.

I think that perhaps it is fair to put into the RECORD a statement of those who were present. I have already named Mr. J. R. Howard. This conference was participated in by the special committee representing the railway executives, of which Mr. Atterbury, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, was chairman. It was held at the Racquet Club in Washington on December 9, 1921. There had been a previous conference in New York on September 21, of which Mr. J. R. Howard was made chairman. Those present at the Racquet Club meeting were Mr. W. W. Atterbury, of the Pennsylvania Railroad; Howard Elliott, of the Northern Pacific; W. J. Hanrahan, of the C. & O.; W. B. Storey, of the Atchison; R. S. Binkert, who is assistant to the chairman of the Association of Railway Executives, New York.

The iron and steel industries were represented by J. A. Campbell, of the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company, of Youngstown, Ohio, and C. E. Bement, of Lansing, Mich., representing the Novo Engine Co.

Railway supply organizations were represented by A. B. Johnson, president of the Railway Business Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., and Frank W. Noxon, secretary of the same association.

Lumber interests were represented by Charles Hill, of the Southern Pine and Sales Corporation, of New York; A. B. Hammond, of the Hammond Lumber Co., of San Francisco, Calif.; J. H. Browne, of the Pacific Lumber Co., New York City.

Construction companies were represented by R. C. Marshall, Munsey Building Washington, D. C., and E. T. Trigg, of Philadelphia, Pa.

The National Industrial Traffic League was represented by W. H. Chandler, Boston, Mass., and J. H. Beek, Chicago, Ill.

The National Association of Manufacturers was represented by J. A. Emery, of Washington, D. C.

The agricultural interests were represented by J. R. Howard, Gray Silver, H. C. McKenzie, of New York, Ralph Snyder, of Kansas, and O. E. Bradfute, of Chicago. I think he is president of the Farm Bureau of Ohio. They were all of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the last three named being members of its legislative committee. The agricultural interests were also represented by W. I. Drummond, president of the International Farm Congress, and by T. C. Atkeson, of the National Grange.

Mr. Atterbury stated that they desired the help of the interests represented in securing further wage reductions, and in opposing the Capper bill. After a considerable discussion, the agricultural representatives not being disposed to oppose the bill absolutely, adjournment was taken for lunch, with the understanding that representatives of the carriers and of the agricultural interests would talk the matter out. After lunch, Mr. Howard reported that the agricultural representatives were prepared to agree that section 15a should not be amended, except for the removal of the proviso in paragraph (3) relating to the percentage of return for two years following March 1, 1920, which expires by statutory limitation in March next.

So far as State control over intrastate rates was concerned, it was agreed that they would not undertake to deprive the Interstate Commerce Commission of power to set aside rates discriminating against intrastate commerce, but that they did desire to have the bill protect the powers of State commissions to function locally. They desired that.

It was left with a committee composed of Mr. Emery, Mr. Atkeson, and Mr. Silver to rewrite the Capper bill. I congratulate the Senator from Kansas. He is to have his bill "fixed" for him. It is also said that it was agreed that the interests represented in the conference would support the bill as redrafted when agreed to by counsel for the railway executives; but, on the other hand, at least one of the men representing another interest denies such agreement for himself, but said the agricultural interests did assent.

Mr. KENYON. Who composed the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The committee to redraft the bill? It was left to a committee composed of Mr. Emery, Mr. Atkeson, and Mr. Silver.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is Mr. Emery the man who was before the lobby committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think he is the gentleman.

Mr. OVERMAN. A lobbyist here?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. He represents the National Manufacturers' Association, which the Senator will remember as an organization that left a very bad odor in its wake as a result of that investigation.

Nothing definite about the Labor Board was decided upon, but the conference agreed to support the carriers in their efforts to obtain a revision of wages. The following committee was appointed to represent the conference in future negotiations with the railway executives: Mr. J. R. Howard and S. J. Lowell, representing the agricultural interests; J. A. Campbell, the steel interests; J. D. Morrow, representing the fuel interests; Mr. T. R. Todd, representing the manufacturing interests; Mr. Charles Hill, the lumber interests; and Mr. Trigg, the construction interests. Mr. Emery was made counsel for the committee.

Mr. KENYON. At what salary?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The salary he is to receive does not appear. I fancy, however, that his salary is amply taken care of by the National Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CAPPER. I should like to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the bill to which he refers as the Capper bill, introduced by me, was prepared by the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Kansas, with the assistance of the general counsel of the State Railway Associations of the United States, and has the support——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The general counsel of the State Railway Associations is Mr. Benton?

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. Benton; and it has the approval, as it ought to, of the farm organizations of Kansas and of other Western States. If any committee undertake to rewrite that bill and make any very material changes in the measure, I think they will hear from the farmers of the West.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think so myself, Mr. President, particularly after the farmers come to be informed concerning the secret agreements which their representatives are making with the great special interests. It is for that reason that I have taken the liberty of detaining the Senate this afternoon, for the purpose of putting this information before the Senate and, in a way, before the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer [Mr. SPENCER] as Acting President pro tempore:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as we approach the foreglow of our Savior's birth, may the memories of the day lead us to reverent reflection and to ministries of love. May the days be replete with happy greetings, joyous firesides, and glad reunions. Bless the hearts that we expect, the friends we look for, and the sweet souls that light up every room in the dear home. But, O touch all sad hearts and give them release; look upon all burdened ones and put the Christmas star of cheer and hope into their night skies. Inspire us with a new birth of courage to take up the angels' song, and may the glad tidings of the chorus break and resound throughout our land until the universal heart exclaims peace on earth, good will toward men, and unto Mary's Child be glory and honor through heaven and earth. Blessed Lord, give all of us a vibrant sense of the higher life, the manifested life of the everlasting Father, and may our souls magnify the Lord, for holy, holy is His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER, WASH.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 9464, a bridge bill, for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to call up the bridge bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9464) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at Central Ferry, Wash.

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Washington be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Snake River at Central Ferry, in section 9, township 13 north, range 40 east of the Willamette meridian, between Colfax, in Whitman County, Wash., and Dayton, in Columbia County, Wash., such a point being along the route of and continuous with the Inland Empire Highway as officially designated by the State highway commissioner of the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "at," insert the words "a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near."

Page 1, line 10, strike out "such a point being along the route of and continuous with the inland Empire Highway as officially designated by the State highway commissioner of the State of Washington."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not catch the entire reading. Does this bill carry the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash."

On motion of Mr. SUMMERS of Washington a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2265. An act to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2265. An act to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

HOUSE RESTAURANT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the gentleman's request. I am not so sure I can accede to that in good faith. I promised gentlemen on the other side to give them an opportunity this morning, or endeavor to give them the opportunity, for some discussion. Unless the gentleman has something very important several gentlemen on this side have been promised three minutes and five minutes, and then we had agreed that the debate should pass to the other side. Will it be agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois if he speaks a little later?

Mr. IRELAND. I would like to speak to as many Members as I can.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I want to keep faith——

Mr. IRELAND. I want to take as little time as possible.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to keep faith with gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. IRELAND. I will withdraw my request if in any way it interferes——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I assume the gentleman from Illinois probably wants to speak of a matter that is of direct interest to the House?

Mr. IRELAND. Quite so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is agreeable to gentlemen on this side to whom I promised time if the gentleman is permitted to proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection.

Mr. IRELAND. I made the request to address the House rather than introduce a privileged resolution, and if it meets with the approval of the House I shall later do so. I want to talk to you just a moment on the subject of the House restaurant, which I approach with considerable hesitation, because [applause] the restaurant is by no means satisfactory to myself at present, and I imagine not to all the Members, though with the usual modesty of the Committee on Accounts I believe we admit there has been some improvement. It is a very difficult job——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman recite the improvement, in what way has it improved?

Mr. IRELAND. Well, perhaps my opinion would not be so good as the gentleman's, but if the gentleman disagrees with that I will agree that they are worse. Is that satisfactory? It has been quite an undertaking and of greater magnitude than we imagined, and the magnitude of the undertaking perhaps would have staggered us had we known of it prior to the time we undertook it. The rearrangement of the restaurant, and so forth, cost much more than they should. The difficulties which were impossible to foresee were encountered.

Mr. GENSMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. In just a moment. They had to be met and so a greater expense was entailed.

I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce to the membership of the House that Dick Banks, the former secretary of Quanah Parker, late chief of the Comanche, called upon me and offered to exhibit to the membership to-night at the caucus room, 305 House Office Building, a picture taken of real Indians in the fastnesses of the Wichita Mountains in my district in Oklahoma. In this picture may be seen some of my best friends, even though their skins are red and some of them can not speak our language. I have known these Indians for 20 years. They have always been my friends. Old Quanah Parker in his lifetime occasionally came to my office when I was beginning the practice of law at Lawton, Okla., in what was known as the Kiowa and Comanche country. Tenequah, Quassyah, Mumskewit, and other old-time Indians accompanied him. I have met these men out on the rolling prairies of southwestern Oklahoma. I have visited them in their camps and homes. They have always been my friends. Geronimo, the noted chief of the Apaches, lived at Fort Sill, near Lawton, as a prisoner of war for a number of years before his death. I met him on frequent occasions. His likeness can now be seen over in the Congressional Library. Regardless of his reputation as a warrior, he was a man of pleasing personality and loyal and true to his friends, and I am proud to be the possessor of a bow and quiver of arrows made by him, which he gave me shortly before his death.

I do not know whether Lone Wolf, or Ahpeatone, are in the picture, but I rather believe that some of their people are. In any event, Mr. Banks has some pictures of these particular Indians, which any Member may see.

In this picture will be seen members of most of the tribes of the Southwest—the Comanches, the Kiowas, the Apaches, the Wichitas, the Caddoes, and other smaller tribes.

The old-time Indian is rapidly passing away. One by one they fold their tepees and cross to the great "Happy Hunting Ground." Soon he will only be of the dim and hazy past, a theme for romantic stories of days long since faded and gone; his tent will no longer be seen in his accustomed camp grounds on the Wichita, Beaver, and Cache; his children will have learned the customs and ways of his white brother, but, seeing that time in the near future as I do, I can not but interpose a word of sorrow and regret at the passing of the real Indian, faithful and generous to a fault to a friend. This is probably the last picture that will ever be taken of the real Indian in his native haunts and in action. It is fortunate indeed from an educational standpoint that it has been possible to obtain a picture of this kind. I have introduced a number of bills in Congress for the relief of and betterment of my Indian friends in Oklahoma. I am indeed anxious that every Member of the House have an opportunity to see a true portrayal of Indian life. I have invited the Hon. Charles H. Burke, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and his assistants to attend the exhibiting of this picture to-night, and I feel sure they will be there. I am sure with this opportunity of becoming more conversant with the real Indian his interest will be better preserved. For the benefit of the Indian and from an educational standpoint, and with a view of being of better and further service to the Indians in my district, who are all my friends, I invite you to the caucus room in the House Office Building to-night at 8 o'clock to witness a picture portraying the Indian as he is. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. To resume a subject much more sordid, though more materially necessary, the expenditures that have been made have all been warranted and the matter has been placed in the most competent hands obtainable, because no member of the Committee on Accounts any more than any Member of the House probably knows anything whatsoever about a restaurant or its conduct or building. The entire matter has been intrusted to the Architect of the Capitol, who has done a magnificent job. It was necessary to rebuild entirely the kitchen in the basement, and I think anyone who had wandered through there prior to the time when the changes were made probably never would have felt tremendously anxious to eat in the restaurant thereafter.

The kitchen had to be rebuilt throughout, and that included the building of a new sewer, a matter which could not be foreseen, which cost us about $3,000 additional. Another item, which cost us about $5,000, was for overtime work, made necessary by the short adjournment of Congress, requiring that a lot of work had to be done at nights and on Sundays.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I understand the restaurant is now operated by the Committee on Accounts, and is no longer a patronage proposition?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. I will come to that in a moment.

I think a detailed report may be made to the House, but just at present we are confronted with a situation upon which I would like to ascertain the temper of the House, and if the committee desires so to do we will follow the present plan of management of the restaurant in the House, or in the future we must resort to the former plan of subletting the restaurant; either that or continue to operate it by the House under the authority of the House and meet such deficits as may occur by paying them out of the contingent fund.

I am happy to say that we have reached an agreement with the Senate management whereby we hope to have a common purchasing agency, exactly similar menus, and prices in common. To-day the Senate restaurant is very often filled with Members of the House, and the Members of the House, as most of you know, are personæ non grata in the Senate restaurant. The effort in the House restaurant is to provide substantial, clean, and wholesome food. The Senate effort is to be relieved of any uninvited visitors from the House. We have been able to reach that working agreement, which we shall work out if the temper of the House so indicates.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Do any of the Senators ever come over to the House restaurant?

Mr. IRELAND. Very seldom. There is no reason for that, because the Senate restaurant has always been superior to that of the House. The House restaurant, as I said, is not wholly satisfactory at present, but we hope to improve it. It is a difficult matter, and it has taken more patience that I am ordinarily in the habit of showing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The Senate restaurant has for a long time been run on the latter of the two plans, so that they have paid deficits as they have arisen?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. I will come to that point. The employees of the Senate restaurant are all on the pay roll, and thereby they are able to show a profit, though a fictitious one, because they take no account of that item of overhead expense. That has not been the custom of the House, even for the last month or two, and, eliminating that item, though the House restaurant operated in an unfair month, because of the adjournment and the work that was being done, the House restaurant showed a greater proportion of profit, eliminating that item of employees in the overhead, than did the Senate. We may safely assume it, and the estimates of the present management assure me that we can operate at a less deficit than the Senate, if that is the wish of the House. Now, your only alternative is to go back to the old system, and I am endeavoring to gain your temper in that regard.

The same food-control company, or system, is in operation in both the House and the Senate, and it is a splendid system, and they give the most comprehensive report that I have ever seen on anything approaching the subject. The same firm that directs and lays down their cost system handles the House restaurant as well, and has done so for the last three months during the installation of the system.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Have they anything to do with the menu?

Mr. IRELAND. Indirectly, because we have had no management other than this. They have to do with the House menu in this case, yes. But they lay down a cost system.

Mr. MANN. Is that more expensive than a manager would be?

Mr. IRELAND. Much less so.

Mr. MANN. I never knew that to be the case.

Mr. IRELAND. The Senate pays $225 a month for this control system. We have paid the same amount, and the president of the company has acted as our manager without compensation.

Mr. MANN. Except for the $225?

Mr. IRELAND. That goes to his company; yes, sir. Not only is every different department of the restaurant shown as to cost, gain, or loss, but even each commodity purchased. It is the most comprehensive system that I have ever seen, and very accurate.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman gets at that point where he wants any Members to express their opinion, I am ready to express mine.

Mr. IRELAND. All right. We will wait on the gentleman from Illinois at once.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have been here a good many years, and I have long since quit eating lunch. I got so that it was out of the question for me to eat luncheon in the House restaurant. When I came out of the hospital my physician ordered me to eat three meals a day, and for quite a while I went to the House restaurant to eat luncheon. But it was too much for me; it threw me out. I could not do it with any degree of satisfaction. Of course other Members get along pretty well about eating luncheon. I have always believed, and I believe now, that the House restaurant ought to be run for the accommodation of the House, to give them a good luncheon or meal, clean and wholesome, and quickly, and that it could not be done by hiring or subletting or leasing the restaurant to somebody else. It never has been done and can not be done. No restaurant keeper knows how many men are coming from the House to the restaurant, or how much business he will have in one day, and generally only at one time in the day. The only way for the House to do is to run the restaurant. If they do and keep it decent, I may go back to obey the orders of my physician.

Mr. IRELAND. I may say that the committee has come to entertain exactly the same opinion as the gentleman from Illinois, having hashed this matter over as a whole and having tried to study it from every angle. Now, we will assume that it is one of the main functions of the Committee on Accounts to provide for the comfort of the Members of this House in so far as it is able to do so, and to see that the contingent fund of the House is judiciously expended and not wasted.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman made the statement that in the Senate the waiters are on the pay rolls of the Government and that therefore they do not figure the wages of the waiters as one of the costs of the restaurant.

Mr. IRELAND. That is true.

Mr. HICKS. But assuming that they did put in the wages, what would be the loss of the Senate restaurant each year?

Mr. IRELAND. For the month of November their loss would have been $4,014.64 if they had charged up their overhead properly, that is simply the salaries of waiters and employees. I have a comparative statement here of the House and Senate restaurants for the month of November, which statement is very unfair to the House because of our several adjournments and of the work that was being done in the restaurant, and unusually favorable to the Senate because of their large volume of business in that month due to their night sessions.

Mr. HICKS. So the Senate is losing $45,000 or $50,000 a year on its restaurant?

Mr. IRELAND. I hope not that much. I would hardly think so. I was about to say that we show a better profit, excluding that item, than the Senate does, even with its increased volume of business last month. They have 88 employees on the restaurant pay roll and we have 60 employees in the restaurant and we are able to get along with that number. At present they pay their waiters $60 a month.

Mr. HICKS. I agree with my friend from Illinois that the House restaurant should be run for the benefit of the Members and paid for by Congress if necessary, and not leased to some private concern.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. In just a moment I will. The Senate by this method of not including the pay roll as a part of the overhead has amassed a slight surplus, say $10,000 or $14,000, and they will further reduce their prices of food. Unless we coordinate with them you will find more of our Members going over to the Senate and getting themselves much more disliked for so doing, and we will be unable to compete with them on an equitable basis. Of course it takes time to win the confidence of the Members of the House, but our restaurant was in such bad odor that Members could not be expected to patronize it, and it will take time to win back their confidence so that they will patronize the House restaurant.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for just one suggestion?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I suppose we all know that the barber-shop employees are paid by the House, that the barbers are on the House pay roll?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know why there should be a distinction between them and the employees of the restaurant.

Mr. IRELAND. Let me say further that we do not propose to suggest to the House to put these waiters upon the pay roll of the House, but we do propose to hold the expense within the operation of the restaurant. It will be apparent to all that that will be much easier and that the vouchers can go through, audited, checked, and approved in the same manner as any other expenses paid from the contingent fund. It will avoid the necessity of putting the waiters upon the pay roll and will enable us to cut down or enlarge our force within certain prescribed limits, as may be required, much better than any other system.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARRISH. How many employees did the gentleman say are on the pay roll of the Senate restaurant?

Mr. IRELAND. Eighty-eight, I believe. I am trusting to my memory when I state that.

Mr. PARRISH. How many would there be in the House?

Mr. IRELAND. Sixty. There are 59 at present.

Mr. PARRISH. They have more employees on their pay roll than we would have?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Even with their smaller membership?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; and the conditions in that regard should be reversed. Unfortunately they are not.

Mr. PARRISH. Just another question, which is suggested by the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the barbers are on the pay roll. Why is it that we always pay for our shaves and hair cuts in the barber shop if the barbers are on the pay roll?

Mr. IRELAND. I suppose the theory of it is that their pay is inadequate and that they have short hours and they do not have an opportunity to pursue their trade in the way that they do in a commercial barber shop.

Mr. PARRISH. I just wanted to know the reason.

Mr. CRISP. Is it not also true that the barbers clean up the Hall of the House after the day's session?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; they are supposed to do that, and they do it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They are not employed by the House as barbers?

Mr. IRELAND. No; they are on the pay roll as laborers.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And they perform duties as laborers?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. Now I would like to hear some expression from the Members on the question.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. IRELAND. Gladly.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman noticed how the Press Club luncheons and dinners are served, and the quality of them?

Mr. IRELAND. I have not been at the Press Club for some time. I know they have a very good system.

Mr. FESS. Probably it can be better done there than it could be done here, on account of the Press Club membership being smaller and the presence of the members more regular from day to day, that there is likely to be about the same number every day; but it seems to me that the Press Club has set a very fine example of what can be done in serving a well-cooked and at the same time inexpensive meal, and at a handsome profit to the club. I do not know whether it could be done here in the House or not.

Mr. IRELAND. They operate on a very small scale, and they are easily satisfied, though the food there is splendid, wholesome, and properly prepared.

Mr. FESS. I can say to my friend that they are not easily satisfied. I think the luncheon and dinner there, especially the dinner, is about the best thing I have seen anywhere of its kind.

Mr. IRELAND. Perhaps they are not easily satisfied. The same thing may be said of Members of the House. I suppose newspaper men and Members of the House are very much alike in that they believe they should kick, whether within reason or not.

Mr. FESS. Why can not our restaurant be operated upon that plan?

Mr. IRELAND. Because you have to operate on a larger scale; you have shorter hours, and owing to adjournments you have a waste in the preparation of food, and there are any number of reasons that enter into it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Gladly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad to note improvement in the House restaurant.

Mr. IRELAND. I am pleased to note that the gentleman sees an improvement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think there is quite an improvement over what it was formerly. However, I am interested in the fact which the gentleman says that our presence in the Senate restaurant is undesirable. They have three rooms over there and I would like to know if our presence is undesirable in all of the three rooms.

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, I am not authorized to speak for the Senate. That is simply my impression.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman said that our presence there was persona non grata.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not mean "undesirable."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have a nice service there, and I like to go over there once in a while.

Mr. IRELAND. If we maintain a good restaurant here, Members would not care to invade the Senate restaurant.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman says the employees of the Senate restaurant are paid $60 a month?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman consider that a living wage?

Mr. IRELAND. No; but a living wage is made up from gratuities.

Mr. McFADDEN. Why not eliminate the gratuities and pay them a living wage?

Mr. IRELAND. Because it would not be lived up to if you made such a rule.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The restaurant should be for Members of the House and their constituents who want to see them while the House is in session, and it is as much of a necessity as the elevator or ice water or any other necessity. I think the only proper and businesslike way to run it is to put it on the basis that the Senate restaurant is run upon, not as a profit-making institution or a concession but at cost for the service of the Members, and I think it can be handled in that way. I agree with the gentleman that it is going to take time to retrieve the reputation of the House restaurant. I do not go there; I have had ptomaine poison twice from eating there and do not propose to risk it again. The last session I got into trouble. The service is not only unclean but it is abominable. I do not know how it is within the last two months.

Mr. OLDFIELD. It has improved greatly.

Mr. WINGO. I go over to the Senate restaurant and I think the food and service there the best in the city.

Mr. IRELAND. I agree to that.

Mr. WINGO. I think if we put the restaurant on a first-class basis, give it the reputation that the Senate restaurant has, it may be made self-sustaining.

Mr. IRELAND. I am assured by the management, the same company, that presides over the Senate, that with this item eliminated we may show a profit of $600 or $1,000 a month, which will be returned to the contingent fund or returned to the Members in additional service.

Mr. WINGO. I know nothing about managing that kind of a business——

Mr. IRELAND. And I will say that I do not believe any Member does.

Mr. WINGO. But I was talking with a gentleman who has had a great deal of experience in handling a club in the city. His criticism was that both the Senate and the House menus are too wide. He says the service can be rendered to Members without the loss that they now have by having the reserve food made up of standard foods. He said if a session is continued unexpectedly the restaurant keeper has no way of knowing it, but there are standard foods that they could fall back upon like eggs, cured meats, and a number of other things which can always be procured at a moment's notice, and that these standard foods are sufficient for Members. He says the waste has come in trying to maintain a supply of too wide a menu which takes in many varieties. He said he could take that restaurant and with the patronage which it has make money and furnish food at a less price. In view of the fact that he has had charge over one of the finest clubs in town, that he has furnished far better meals, with the exception of the Senate, than I have been able to get anywhere else, I have great faith in what he says. As far as I am concerned, I hope that gentlemen will put it on a basis where we can get something like we now have in the Senate restaurant, and it can be done at cost with no expense to the public.

Mr. IRELAND. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, which I hope will take care of the situation, if I have correctly interpreted the temper of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman ought not to bring this up with only 40 or 50 Members present—in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. IRELAND. Then I will say that the responsibility of further handling the matter will have to rest elsewhere.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print a letter in the RECORD from the commander of the American Legion which was written some time ago and is a very excellent presentation of an important matter that is coming before the House. It is one of the most comprehensive and appealing statements upon this subject that I know of. It was written by him as a banker to another banker, and I should like to have it go into the RECORD, somewhat deleted, as it appears.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

COMPENSATION AND A FINANCIER.

MASON CITY, IOWA.

DEAR ———: I was very much disturbed to note that the good house of ——— and ——— had been one of the heaviest subscribers to an antibonus and lobbying campaign. I hope the information was incorrect, because, as a prominent member of your firm and as an ex-service and, I hope, a Legion man, I know that your advice and thought in such matters would naturally be followed.

I don't want to pull a lot of sob stuff on you nor do I want to accuse you of lack of appreciation of what these lads did and what they went through for those good people who now holler the loudest, and who—even as you and I—are best qualified to stand the burden if it is one of extra taxation. No one has the right to say these men should not have what they want, to begin with, and certainly no one has the right to take the stand that they should not be at least partially compensated for the months or years they put in the service.

OUR FOREFATHERS.

I know the arguments that are propounded against adjusted compensation—of the danger of our promulgating another gigantic pension drain upon the country, of selling our patriotism, of the uselessness of giving these men this money only to have them squander it, and all the rest. I could not help but be grimly amused to read the pitiful appeal of ——— to look back at our forefathers and to follow their noble principles—not mine, for mine came over in the steerage not so long ago, but his and, I presume, most of New England's. His own little college taught me that these Revolutionary gentlemen, and brave and good they were—don't misunderstand me—not only demanded a bonus but demanded it before they would enlist, and a very alarming percentage deserted to reenlist and catch this gratuity all over again. On top of that they pulled down about an Ohio county as a reward afterwards, which makes our fourfold-compensation scheme look exceedingly mild and very insignificant in comparison.

But here is the point: No man who did not see these lads of ours in the line—and if I am not mistaken, we ended up with nearly 2,000,000 of them there, or perhaps patrolling the North Sea or doing convoy duty in one of those bouncing iron boxes—has any conception of what wonderful stuff young America is. I could give you a hundred examples of unbelievable heroism—men wounded and shattered sent back from the line to the rear would come staggering up again with food or water or ammunition for their buddies; men would run into the face of terrific machine-gun fire to rescue a wounded comrade; a wounded man would give his gas mask to another blessé unable to help himself, and die cheerfully, himself choking with gas.

THE LONG NIGHT MARCH.

Perhaps the most vivid instance that typifies it all to me was the night march before the jump off on the 18th of July, 1918, southwest of Soissons, an operation now accredited, I think, with turning the tide. We had some three hundred and odd replacements, five weeks old in uniform, join us that night—Lord knows how they found us—and they were slapped under the end of the column. All night they plunged along the side of those roads, which were jammed with artillery and transport moving up for the surprise attack. It was rainy, of course, and packs were soaked and heavier than lead. Falling into shell holes, tearing themselves on the barb wire, floundering along single file, but every one of them hanging on like grim death to the man in front of him, every man knowing down in his heart that it was over the top in the dark of the morning with the chances not over 50–50 that he would ever see the sun shine again or his home or the trees or the flowers, but hanging on for fear he would get lost and would not be able to do his part. Why? Because they were Americans.

What has all this got to do with adjusted compensation? Just this, that these bucks, these plain enlisted men—and let me add right here that it was the fine, high, and wonderful spirit of the buck private which won this war for America, not general headquarters nor the General Staff nor the officers of the line, though they all did their part; these bucks, these lads you pass now every day on the street, your neighbor's boy, the lad who works for you, and, believe me, every one of them has the makings of the finest heroes the world has even produced—have everything coming from their country, and they at least should have an even chance with the birds who cheered them off and won the war here at home.

"IT IS ONLY JUSTICE."

Damn it, ———, if it wasn't simple justice they should have it anyway, but it is only justice. Those who don't need it need not take it. Let them give it to those who do, or to their Legion post for relief work. There is no way to pick out just which ones should have it. The only way to reach the deserving is to give it to them all. I could tell you of a dozen men I know and any case would convince you.

A lad from my old outfit wandered in here the other day, looking rather worse for wear, but cheerful enough at that. He wanted to know what I thought the prospects for a Government loan were. He had a chance to buy a cow and he wanted it. This is his story:

On the day war was declared he was working as a farm hand just outside of town. He had saved up a couple of hundred dollars, had the prospects of renting a farm for the coming year, and intended to be married. But his country had declared war, and the next day he enlisted in the Infantry, unable to see any other course clear. He had a furlough a month or so afterwards and he married the girl he was going to leave behind. This kid went through the whole show, over the top a dozen times, and with all the hell bursting around him for months, that these good Americans here at home when the news rolled back from the western front might stick out their chests and say, "Thank God we're Americans."

Out of his $30 a month this lad sent all he had, after his insurance was paid, back to his wife, and true enough the Government doubled it, but she couldn't make the grade on that alone and she worked every week that he was gone, with the exception of one in which their baby was born. He got back in August last year, too late to take a farm, with his uniform still on and the $60 which proud America so generously gave him. He has had a hard time making a go of it, because the profession of farm hand does not pay heavily and no one wants a farm hand with a family.

Through the kindness of a former employer, he has 40 acres to make his living on this year, but, as you know, the produce of the farm does not come in until fall. He wanted to borrow money enough to get this cow and see if he couldn't at least pay up something on the grocery and other bills which had been accumulating against him while he was eking out his living on the soil. That $60 did not even pay for a suit of civilian clothes for him, and yet this grateful Nation, who, as I said, stuck out its chest and hollered while this kid fought for them, is willing to actually combat the chances for this lad to get an even break.

But in the last analysis the question is this: "Do you owe this man anything or don't you?" If you feel that you do, the heads of the Legion, their accredited representatives, should not only have your good will but your active support, and those of us whose income is going to be dug into hardest should be the happiest to have it so, and you know it.

HANFORD MACNIDER.

BRIDGE ACROSS ESCAMBIA RIVER AT OR NEAR CENTURY, FLA.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2790) to authorize the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., to construct a bridge across the Escambia River at or near Century, Fla., which I send to the desk. Before the bill is read I would state that the reason that I ask this action now is because it is an emergency matter. The two counties are waiting for the passage of this bill to begin the construction of the bridge.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Escambia River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between said counties, and at or near Century, Fla., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was the bill reported from the committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. This bill was reported from the House committee just a few days ago. It passed the Senate. A similar bill is pending in the House. The two counties involved are waiting now to get authority to construct the bridge. They want to begin it before the 1st of January.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the report shows the date of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; it was reported on the 21st. The report was authorized by the committee five days ago. It was reported only yesterday.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I listened to the reading of the bill I notice that these two counties, "their successors and assigns," are to be granted this privilege. That would permit the counties to turn that bridge over to private individuals.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not intended to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is not intended, certainly, but it would be permitted.

Mr. BARKLEY. The committee took the matter up, and it seems that under the law of Florida instead of using the word "successors" they used the word "assigns."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. "Assigns" is entirely different from the word "successors."

Mr. MANN. Sometimes they have to borrow money and issue bonds on a thing of this sort, and in that case it is absolutely essential, in order to get the money, that the word "assigns" be used. Theoretically at least the mortgagee may get possession of the bridge, though I have never known that practically to happen.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is very important that this be left just as it is, on account of the fact that the two counties have had difficulties in raising the money to build the bridge. They have the arrangements all made now, and they want to begin the construction of the bridge before the 1st of January. There will be no difficulty about the use of the word "assigns."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I appreciate that it is important, but it is important also that bridges over navigable streams be not turned over to private individuals.

Mr. BARKLEY. There has never been a boat up that river as far as where this bridge is to be constructed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Nevertheless it is a navigable stream, or else the bill would not be here.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is theoretically a navigable stream, but practically it is not. It is a fiction of law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman say that these two counties can not borrow money unless the word "assigns" is used?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not sure they could not; no.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Have they tried?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill is entirely satisfactory to them in that respect. They have for quite a long time been attempting to get the funds with which to construct the bridge.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Have they been trying?

Mr. BARKLEY. They have, and have now just reached the point where they have succeeded.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, if the counties can not raise the money, I suppose they will turn this over to the assigns.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think they intend to do that; but they want the authority.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the way it looks to me. If they are anxious to have it that way, however, I shall let it go.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARKLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was ordered to lie on the table.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] control one half of the time and that I control the other half of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, at this session of Congress it is proposed to pass a consumption or sales tax that will lay a new tax burden and increased prices on necessaries of life consumed by 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 idle laborers and their families, on millions of farmers and other laborers and their families who are now fighting for bare existence, and on over 3,000,000 ex-soldiers and their families, who are told the price of any compensation bill is a consumption tax.

A bill recently introduced provides for a consumption tax to finance a soldiers' compensation bill. Practically the same compensation bill overwhelmingly passed the House last session, but a similar consumption tax was then stricken from the bill. Powerful influences now urging a consumption or sales tax include several great influential newspapers and equally great financial interests, so that any attempt to stem the propaganda favoring a consumption tax may appear to be futile.

This is especially true when the tax is put forth to help finance a soldiers' compensation bill, who may prefer a half loaf to no bread at all, but in view of the announced purpose eventually to substitute a large consumption tax for the existing income tax, so stated by several witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee, reasons are here offered why a consumption tax should not be saddled on the backs of the American people through a soldiers' bonus bill or by any other bill. A published statement, credited to Secretary Mellon, that a compensation bill can be financed by a tax on wines and beer is not likely to receive serious consideration from the House, but sources of revenue will be suggested that can amply finance any soldiers' compensation bill which may be passed by Congress and justly should be made to do so.

Over a half billion dollars in annual revenues have been taken from Treasury receipts during the present session by repeal of the excess-profits tax, luxury taxes, and reduction of surtaxes, some of which were used to finance the prior compensation bill. These sources of revenue can well afford to pay reasonable tribute to the soldiers who by winning the war made such profits possible. In addition to these sources of revenue, an annual income of over $1,000,000,000 may be collected through an increased inheritance tax, gift tax, undistributed income tax, and last but not least, by interest on foreign debts. Other sources of revenue will be mentioned, from all of which several times the estimated required amount of $350,000,000 annually can be raised to finance a soldiers' compensation bill.

If need be, the entire amount to be raised for the five-year payments, estimated at $1,500,000,000, can be paid out of sources of revenue hereinafter offered from one year's collections under normal conditions.

These suggestions are made incidental to a discussion of the objectionable sales tax, which is expected to find a vehicle for its passage in the compensation bill. Once adopted the tremendous influence and power behind a sales tax will be employed to prevent its repeal. A camel's nose under the tent will soon overturn the tent, according to the purposes of those who hope ultimately to shift the existing graduated income tax over to a general consumption tax. That is the proposition I desire to discuss, but in order to present the situation now confronting Congress it is proper to set forth what Congress has done recently in tax matters, so that the effect of the present sales-tax proposal may be carefully weighed before action is taken.

I have no quarrel with those who advocate any tax nor have I disposition to discuss scores of editorials favoring a sales tax that have deluged Members. Manifest errors could be pointed out, but I am content to place before you facts and opinions of recognized taxation authorities that must be faced by Representatives when called upon to enact a consumption tax.

THE TAX PROGRAM—WHY AND HOW PASSED.

When powerful news agencies and big business men who control the press combine to push legislation through Congress it seems a hopeless task for individual Members to voice a passing protest before such legislation is adopted. Constant dropping of suggestions through the press has become a recognized influence felt in practically every important matter of legislation that comes before Congress. The plan to put a sales tax through Congress is being pressed so strongly that I feel it proper to call attention, so far as able, to the legislative situation, so we may not forget the viewpoint of the man back home or the man on the street who is not heard from in matters of legislation excepting when his ballot expresses approval or rejection of the record made here.

From recent legislation we may reasonably anticipate what will occur during the coming session. Let us recall, lest we forget.

Immediately following the 1920 election an unparalleled legislative propaganda was started by the press of New York and elsewhere, aided by Otto Kahn, Jules Bache, and many other financiers representing big business interests of New York City to carry out the following program:

First. To repeal the tax on surplus profits of corporations.

Second. To repeal or reduce higher surtaxes on incomes.

Third. To repeal taxes on luxuries.

Fourth. To enact a sales tax that eventually will supplant all income taxes.

A catching slogan adopted by the propagandists was, "Stop soaking the rich."

War developed new methods of propaganda that are now employed to control Federal legislation, and the power is never more dangerous than when inspired and pressed by self-interest. Demands from the big business bloc that taxes should be repealed before enactment of a new tariff law soon overwhelmed Congress, and Congress complied with that mandate by sidetracking the tariff and passing a vulnerable tax law.

This propaganda for the repeal of taxes on wealth was made in the face of a national debt of $24,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 of indebtedness maturing in 1923.

Before discussing the proposed sales tax law and propaganda which will again confront Congress on that subject we may well study the recent legislative record responsive to propaganda and know what real "blocs" have done during 1921 in Congress.

AGRICULTURAL AND OTHER "BLOCS."

A word as to the "agricultural bloc" that has stirred the complacency of aged existing blocs. I hold no brief for any "bloc," but Members so designated represent more than agriculture and agricultural interests, vitally important as these interests are to mankind. It may be said that Members included in the so-called agricultural bloc represent farmers and other laborers, organized and unorganized, and shopkeepers, clerks, and, in fact, practically ninety-nine people out of every hundred who do not draw down excess profits or incomes of $10,000 or more annually which invite proportionate surtax collections.

Representing the ninety and nine of their constituents, in addition to the remaining 1 per cent, this so-called "bloc" does not always respond to the cry "be regular" when regularity consists only in relieving the exclusive 1 per cent of taxes from out their abundance and thereupon shifting the burden over to the ninety and nine through a consumption tax.

Long before the days when corporation blocs controlled the earth and its fullness thereof through consolidation and monopoly; before great financial blocs through credit control determined the life or death of individual industry; before great business blocs stifled and influenced the press through threats to withdraw advertising; before the days of 100 per cent to 500 per cent profiteering blocs that have aroused the Attorney General to prosecutions; before existing propaganda became a fine art—long, long before these days of modern blocs, there existed other blocs popularly known as "big business." Though unfinished in organization and possessing crude methods they were even then all powerful in the political, legislative, and financial world.

Long prior to Winston Churchill's Conniston days their power was exercised in almost every large city, in nearly every State legislature from Massachusetts and New York to California, and in both branches of Congress.

Whether known as the "railway group," "manufacturers' group," or "bankers' group" their influence was felt even as other more powerful blocs are potent now, but the crudeness of early days has given way to modern skillful legislative manipulation which refused to permit 435 duly elected Representatives to offer a single amendment in the House on a 150-page revenue bill and allowed only two or three days of political "general debate" on the greatest bill of all history. Many other illustrations can be offered of that same bloc power. The old groups influenced legislation by antiquated methods, the modern financial bloc, by right of inheritance and habit, controls with an iron hand and directs us what to do.

INDIGNANT PROTESTANTS AGAINST "BLOCS."

Secretary Weeks, Otto Kahn, and other large banking and brokerage critics can open a Pandora's box of blocs, ancient and modern, and invite many rather direct inquiries by chiding and threatening Representatives in Congress who conscientiously act under their oaths of office.

I do not question the right of any of my colleagues to vote or act as they choose nor impugn their judgment as to legislation, but assumed indignation of vulnerable critics will deceive no one in this day and age regarding venerable blocs grown grizzled through long and constant service.

That the right to vote independently is not acceptable to those who assume to be guardians of our consciences and actions is evident from a statement given to the press on December 1 last by Mr. Otto Kahn, a representative of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., bankers and brokers of New York City, a copy of which was sent by Mr. Kahn to every Member of Congress.

He says:

> Business must organize to overcome the baneful effects of the agricultural bloc in Congress. * * * Business stands in need of a spokesman and organizer. * * * I mean an intelligent and effective representative of the aims and ideas of business in public affairs and corresponding attitude in primary and electoral campaigns * * * to prevent the ascendency of selfish and narrow class and sectional interests and crude notions or demagogic appeal and thus aid in furthering the welfare and progress of the Nation.

Mr. Kahn not only seeks to be guardian of our legislative liberties but was a leading champion of the consumption tax before the Ways and Means Committee. He is constantly quoted in the press on that subject, and in fact on practically every other subject, which he generally discusses with self-confidence.

UNIQUE TRAINING OF SALES TAX EXPERTS AND CONGRESSIONAL GUARDIANS.

First and foremost is Mr. Otto Kahn, banker and broker. Mr. Jules Semon Bache, same business, and Messrs Kline, Rothschild, and Goldsmith, all from New York City, who speak in general harmony and all work to the same end—to urge upon Congress the necessity of protecting New York brokers and bankers through a consumption sales tax law—consumption, because if enacted into law it will consume a large part of the scanty means of the 100,000,000 people who have no excess profits but whom Congress also represents.

Mr. Kahn writes his own biography in Who's Who, 1916–17, page 1336, as follows:

> Banker. Born, Mannheim, Germany, 1867. Served one year in German Army. Learned banking in Germany and afterwards was in London branch Deutsche Bank. * * * Member banking firm Kuhn, Loeb & Co. since 1897. Director Royal Opera, Covent Garden, London. Chairman Metropolitan Opera Co. Chairman Century Opera Co. Vice president Chicago Grand Opera Co. Director Boston Opera Co.

And so forth. All of which tends to show that Mr. Kahn holds the center of the stage when not engaged with his other duties of banker and broker in New York. Mr. Kahn has been in the public eye so frequently when instructing the people of America as to their duties on many subjects that in order to set at rest reports stating he is now a subject of Germany or a citizen of Great Britain, an authentic statement given in 1920—November 6—to the press by his attorney, P. H. Cravath, is quoted as follows:

The naturalization proceedings taken by Mr. Kahn (who was a naturalized British subject in 1893) were in charge of a New Jersey lawyer. Mr. Kahn received his final papers in March, 1917, from the court of common pleas at Morristown.

The statement at length sets forth why Mr. Kahn, once a German soldier and German citizen and afterwards a British subject, has now renounced all allegiance to those Governments. He now seeks to direct the American Congress and tax legislation for America.

Singularly enough, Germany has a tax system comparable to Mr. Kahn's consumption-tax plan, although Great Britain, which he says has "a wise financial system," rejects a turnover sales tax, which Mr. Kahn would saddle onto America, the country of his adoption in 1917, or less than five years ago.

Speaking of grand operas, why is it not more just to reenact a luxury tax of even 20 per cent on $5 opera seats occupied by those permitted to enjoy the luxuries of life instead of levying a secret consumption tax with increased prices on the cradle and coffin with which we come in and go out?

With this passing reference to big business and sales-tax propagandists, let us briefly review a part of the program put through Congress during last session.

A HALF BILLION DOLLARS TAX REPEALED.

First. The excess-profits tax has been repealed, as demanded by these interests, or "blocs," with a loss to the Treasury, even during poor business conditions of 1920, of $450,000,000 annually.

Second. Surtaxes on great incomes have been reduced from 65 per cent to 50 per cent, with an estimated loss of about $61,500,000 annually, although the propaganda demanded greater reduction than that allowed by the Senate, to which rate of 50 per cent the House agreed.

Third. All luxury taxes have been repealed, with a further loss to the Treasury of about $60,000,000 annually.

A total estimated reduction in revenue receipts of approximately $570,000,000 results from these three sources alone, or an amount equal to 25 per cent of all estimated income contained in the 1921 revenue bill passed during the present session, notwithstanding no reduction occurred in the $24,000,000,000 national debt nor has any provision been made to that end.

Some efforts to increase the inheritance and gift taxes occurred in the Senate, but notwithstanding we could have increased inheritance taxes over $200,000,000 annually, which would have still remained below English rates of to-day, the attempt was blocked—not by any agricultural bloc, however—and was killed in conference under a plea that any inheritance tax increase was another attempt to "soak the rich." Practically as much more could have been received from gift taxes, but that, too, was prevented by the same interests.

Attempts to increase the corporation normal tax from 10 per cent to 16 per cent, as proposed by Secretary Houston in his 1920 report, were defeated and also blocked, but not by the agricultural bloc, and only 2½ per cent normal taxes were added to meet the promised Treasury deficit. This is only one-half the increase recommended by the Senate, and a 12½ per cent rate is only 40 per cent of the 30 per cent normal corporation tax of Great Britain to-day. Secretary Houston's 16 per cent rate would have raised $150,000,000 more annually and would have helped meet the loss of $450,000,000 caused by the excess-profits tax repeal; but the Senate amendment was rejected under the cry that it would "soak the rich."

A proposal to tax undistributed profits of corporations estimated by Secretary Houston in his 1920 report to bring $690,000,000 annually was also blocked, but not by the agricultural bloc, and was rejected with slight consideration. This tax under ordinary conditions would bring to the Treasury over $500,000,000 annually, based on estimates submitted by Secretary Houston, but the proposal was rejected because it was again distorted to mean "soaking the rich." In other words, the following is offered as a conservative estimate of what the 1921 tax bill might reasonably have brought to the Treasury but for the constant blocking of legislation by the cry it "soaked the rich and oppressed business." Here are the items:

First. Excess-profits tax repealed	$450,000,000
Second. Reduced surtaxes on income	61,500,000
Third. Luxury taxes repealed	60,000,000
Fourth. Inheritance taxes	200,000,000
Fifth. Gift taxes	200,000,000
Sixth. Undistributed profits proposals rejected	500,000,000
	1,471,500,000
Corporation normal tax credit added of 2½ per cent	111,000,000
	1,360,500,000

To these items may be added over $250,000,000 annually in interest payments on foreign loans that should be collected.

From the foregoing statement it appears that up to and including the last interest period foreign obligations reached $10,141,267,585, and accrued interest $943,534,755, or a total indebtedness from foreign Governments to ours of $11,084,802,341.67.

AVAILABLE REVENUES PREFERABLE TO A SALES TAX.

These sources of revenue, with reenactment of repealed tax laws, will bring to the Treasury over $1,500,000,000 annually with which to finance a $350,000,000 estimated annual charge through a soldiers' compensation bill. Further sources of revenue are covered in the so-called "Victory taxes" carried in the soldiers' compensation bill which passed the House last session. They include increased surtaxes, a stock and bond tax, produce exchange tax, real estate sales tax, and tobacco tax, all of which are specially set forth in H. R. 14089, May 15, 1920, which passed the House overwhelmingly.

Again other sources of revenue were pointed out by me on April 27, 1920, based on reliable data furnished by Treasury officials to include increased taxes on automobiles, admissions, and so forth. These sources of revenue are here mentioned to forestall any assumed necessity for new "Victory consumption taxes" or "security sales taxes" that may now be urged under the plea they are required to finance a soldiers' compensation bill.

I shall not discuss the refusal to permit the House to vote on any amendment to the greatest revenue bill of all history or the gag rule adopted in the popular branch of Congress when compared with open public discussion and a record of 835 amendments adopted by the Senate after two months' debate on that same bill.

Nor will I discuss the failure of Congress thus far to pass a tariff bill, thereby leaving the 1913 Underwood tariff rates still in force on all products not included in the emergency bill. Great pressure was brought by those who desired their taxes removed, and Congress was assured by the big business bloc that capital would quickly engage in business when tax revisions were assured. Capital was not waiting on tax revision nor so far as known has a single wheel from Maine to California been turned due to the revenue bill just passed.

WHY TAX GREAT WEALTH?

A few favored rich men have been relieved, but why should not millions of dollars of the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts, the Astors and Marshall Fields, the Armours, and a few hundred other fortunate men be required to pay liberally for the support of Government? Rockefeller, with hundreds of millions, was a poor boy, but due to liberal laws of this country, railway rebates, crushing of business rivals, and to his own brains and opportunity he has accumulated more than any king ever possessed. Webster, Lincoln, McKinley, and thousands of others failed when measured by such standards of wealth, yet their brains and industry will never suffer by comparison. Vanderbilt the elder with his ferryboat and Astor with his furs and real estate and Marshall Field with his business ability were types of early captains of industry who began as poor boys but under our liberal laws they grew too rich to count their wealth, and posterity is counting that same wealth by right of our easy inheritance laws.

Captains of industry must stand on their own methods and records. If reputable, no man need question the amount of their wealth or its rapidity of accumulation, but we owe it to the people of this day and generation to enact laws affecting powerful concentration and retention of wealth in a few hands, thereby controlling incentive, avenues of industry, and agencies of information through the press, which they so frequently own. Taxation according to ability to pay is just and is a principle as old as the hills, never more needed than now. Inheritance taxes as high as those of Great Britain are not unjust here, where fabulous fortunes are made in a day and left almost intact to legal heirs.

A different chapter can be written of the hundred millions of people in this country who are not so fortunate or so smart in a business way, but they include preachers and scholars and thinkers who generally have made the world better and wiser by reason of their own unselfish labors. We do not envy or begrudge those who have large wealth with the responsibilities and worries such fortunes entail, but we do say "tote fair."

Tax burdens should be placed on those best able to pay, so that the poor and unfortunate may be relieved so far as possible from burdens of government. Sickness, doctors' bills, food, rent, heat, children's shoes and stockings, these are sources of worry to thousands and hundreds of thousands of families to-day, and yet in this enlightened age, with a continued record of profiteering and hoarded wealth never dreamed of a half century ago, we are chided with "soaking" the rich, and now after repealing the tax laws named we are asked to enact a sales tax that will secretly but directly increase the burdens and costs of living of every man, woman, and child in the country in proportion to the necessaries of life the average family consumes.

Congress reduced the surtax that has lost to the Treasury $60,000,000 annually from incomes of $200,000 and over, and is now asked to place a porous-plaster secret tax, increasing the prices of all necessaries of life included in the tax that will be paid by the 98 per cent to cover that loss. Why is Congress called upon to levy a secret tax upon the consuming poor of the country when it has just repealed a tax of a half billion dollars annually from excess profits after first allowing 8 per cent profits for exemptions?

PARTY PLATFORM—THE 98 PER CENT AND THE 2 PER CENT.

In 1920 the Republican platform, then drafted to meet exigencies, declared as follows on taxation:

> The whole fiscal policy of the Government must be deeply influenced by the necessity of meeting obligations in excess of $5,000,000,000 which matures in 1923, but sound policy equally demands the early accomplishment of the real reduction of the tax burden * * * tax laws which do not excessively mulct the consumer or needlessly repress enterprise and thrift. * * *

The platform was written in generalities, like all platforms, to obtain the confidence of the 26,000,000 people who voted at the election and to assure them that their taxes would be relieved. The platform did not refer to excess profits, luxury taxes, or surtaxes, nor to Pullman nor parlor car taxes. It just talked to the multitude. Every man and every woman who read that platform promise, every "consumer" who read it believed it was addressed to him and to her.

The 98 per cent of the 26,000,000 voters who do not pull down excess profits nor high surtaxes did not know that this platform utterance on taxes meant a remittance of over a half billion dollars in excess profits and high surtaxes paid by the 2 per cent, nor did the 98 per cent know that in addition to that interpretation of the party platform it was proposed that the half billion dollars so paid by the 2 per cent in annual taxes would be shifted over to the 98 per cent through a consumption tax on necessaries of life, so as to "mulct the consumer."

In other words, the platform was read intelligently and understandingly only by the 2 per cent, who immediately began a campaign for tax shifting, which the Executive has said was against his understanding of the aforesaid platform prohibiting "shifting."

The last political campaign was not waged. It moved automatically like a tidal wave, without extraneous force, and it offered an invitation to every disgruntled faction against a common political foe. Waste, extravagance, political dictation, taxation, the League of Nations, and innumerable banners led the victorious hosts and swung the political pendulum to the farthest extreme, and in this swinging operation the 98 per cent furnished a very conspicuous part to the momentum compared with the 2 per cent.

In fact, the 98 per cent had much to do with the result in 1920. Last fall witnessed a remarkable swing back not accounted for by normal records, but in New York, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere it seemed possible that the 98 per cent had heard of the new interpretation to be given to the platform plank on taxation.

Next fall the 98 per cent will again listen to what has been given to them by law and what the 2 per cent has received out of the campaign promise grab bag. Last year the 2 per cent tried to fasten a consumption tax on the compensation bill for soldiers, so that the soldiers and their families would only get a half loaf in remembrance, among other things, for protecting from German indemnity the profits and property of the 2 per cent. That fastening broke loose before it then passed the House, but grown bolder by successes the 2 per cent proposes to make the consumption tax stick this time. Many leading newspapers have large financial interests at stake and are on the job, and the 2 per cent is working overtime to secure a sales tax and to finance any soldiers' compensation bill with a consumption tax. The 98 per cent have little voice at this time. They did not correctly understand the last platform. Next fall it will be necessary to hold the pendulum steady and to show that the 98 per cent has not been victimized by a confidence game.

So much for the platform and the 2 per cent and the 98 per cent and for sublime confidence and proposed confidence games.

ALL TAXES TO BE COLLECTED FROM A CONSUMPTION TAX.

Different witnesses, with astonishing frankness, have stated to the Ways and Means Committee that they want a consumption tax enacted so that it will become a substitute for the income tax and the graduated surtaxes provided under existing law.

They ignore the principle that taxes should be levied according to ability to pay, and substitute for this well-known principle a contention repeatedly exploded that all taxes are borne by the ultimate consumer. The testimony of able tax experts is to the contrary.

I quote briefly from the testimony before our committee of Jules Bache, a broker and banker of New York, one of the foremost advocates of a consumption tax, as to its purpose:

> Mr. HULL. Your idea, then, is to base all taxes as nearly as possible on consumption?
> Mr. BACHE. Yes, sir.

Throughout Mr. Bache's testimony he repeatedly offered the sales tax as a method of taxation and substitute for all other taxes.

Dwight Braman, of New York, another representative of big business, testified before our committee on the following day, December. 18, 1920:

> Mr. COLLIER. You do not believe in revenue taxes in normal times?
> Mr. BRAMAN. No, sir. I can quote you authorities.
> Mr. COLLIER. You believe taxes should be raised through consumption tax and licenses?
> Mr. BRAMAN. Yes, sir.
> Mr. COLLIER. You want to do away with the income tax altogether?
> Mr. BRAMAN. Yes; ultimately, I do. * * *

Mr. Rothschild, of New York, who with Mr. Bache has been a rival in leadership for the imposition of a consumption tax, stated to our committee in a 31-page pamphlet, as follows:

> My own personal view is that business through the medium of a small turnover tax could well pay the entire cost of economically running the Government, take care of the great national debt, and permit the dropping of other kinds of Federal taxation. Such an exclusive tax would naturally eliminate a personal-income tax, relieve business from the burden of providing additional interest dividends or profits, which it must now furnish to pay the income tax.

Many other witnesses who claim to be tax experts representing the 2 per cent could be quoted on this same subject. Mr. Rothschild in answer to a question by Mr. Garner as to whether or not he would repeal the income tax stated frankly:

> In my heart I believe nearly every dollar of income tax is somehow or other paid through business operations.

Mr. Rothschild added a significant statement in his pamphlet:

> It is safe to assume that in the past for every dollar the Government has collected either as a duty on imports or excise tax on liquor and tobacco, the consumer paid at least $2 or 100 per cent profit on the duty and excise tax, which additional dollar the Government did not get.

To the same effect Senator Hardwick testified that upward of 5 cents extra was collected from the consumer on soft drinks and only one-half cent returned to the Government in taxes, or ten times the tax was paid by the consumer.

To the same effect, also Canadian authorities claim prices there have increased several times over the actual tax that is collected by the Government revenue agent. We are thus facing an acknowledged situation that the same tax which costs the consumer several times the amount of tax turned into the Treasury is to become a general consumption tax that will eventually be substituted for all income taxes now paid under existing law.

WEIGHING THE TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES.

In important trials at law where the conscious or unconscious bias of witnesses may influence the jury, the lawyers at the outset seek to ascertain what interest financial or otherwise may affect the witnesses' judgment. Witnesses are extremely human and like the counsel in the case are frequently prejudiced or strongly influenced by circumstances. In fact, few of us can escape that estimate, however free we may be from financial or conscious prejudice in legislation.

What of the witnesses whose opinions are offered for or against a sales tax? If, as is confidently predicted, a sales tax on consumption is to be substituted for the present graduated income tax, then everybody paying a large income tax has a direct financial interest in the enactment of a sales tax. Even Representatives in Congress are confronted with its personal effect on their own fortunes. Under existing law incomes now pay the following annual taxes to the Government:

Income.	Normal tax.	Surtax, 1921 act.	Total tax.
$6,000	$160		$160
$10,000	480	$40	520
$20,000	1,280	440	1,720
$25,000	1,600	780	2,380
$30,000	2,080	1,440	3,520
$50,000	3,680	4,960	8,640
$75,000	5,600	11,800	17,400
$100,000	7,680	22,460	30,140
$200,000	15,680	70,960	86,640
$500,000	30,680	220,960	260,640
$1,000,000	79,680	470,960	550,640

The foregoing statement furnished by the Treasury actuary and given by Representative SINNOTT, of Oregon, December 17, is here offered to show that the financial interest of a witness receiving $25,000 income annually is $2,380 annually, and of $50,000 income is $8,640. At $75,000 income the witness has a $17,400 annual interest in a sales tax, which is almost doubled at $100,000, and reaches $86,640 annual tax on a $200,000 income. At $1,000,000 income, indicating a fortune of about $20,000,000, the personal interest of the taxpayer in a sales tax reaches $550,640 annually. That enormous personal interest may be a measure for testing the judgment of some witnesses who advocate the substitution of a consumption tax for the personal income tax.

I am not discussing the merits of the income-tax rate, although the act of 1921 under the Senate amendment reduced all incomes below $86,000 through the 50 per cent Senate rate. The table cited affords evidence of the comparative interest of every person paying an income tax in shifting his personal income tax to a general consumption tax. The income tax reaches every avenue of business, and we are reminded it affects bankers, brokers, financiers, great publishers, and even brilliant writers, who are fortunate to possess large incomes. That the personal side of the matter affects the opinions and judgment of those who feel that wealth is penalized may be reasonably certain.

How far it consciously affects the judgment or policy of those urging the sales tax is a matter to consider when we are asked to shift these taxes onto the many millions of men whose average income on which to support a family of five or more reaches less than $1,000 annually, or to the millions of farmers whose average wage return in 1920 reached $465, apart from investment, with a comparative purchasing power in farm products of only $219 compared to prices in 1913. These figures, given by Representative ANDERSON, of Minnesota, on December 21, offer a tragic picture of existing conditions, and yet we are asked to shift the income tax now paid by those in affluent circumstances over to the shoulders of the American farmer who, out of his meager income, will be asked to pay a consumption tax for himself and every member of his family.

OTHER CONSUMPTION TAX WITNESSES.

I started out to discuss the personal interest affecting testimony of financiers, publishers, writers, and others who appeal to Congress to pass a consumption tax and likewise of those who oppose the tax. It may be safely assumed that among those who oppose a consumption tax will be found 5,000,000 jobless, many of whom have wives, children, or other dependents, all of whom under a consumption tax will immediately contribute through what they eat, drink, wear, and use in higher prices. Many other millions composing the 98 per cent who receive annually less than $1,000, and the 1,500,000 wage earners who receive between $1,000 and $2,000 income also have a vital interest in protesting against a consumption tax. Even the 1,500,000 other wage earners who receive between $2,000 and $3,000 annually, and the 600,000 other wage earners who receive between $3,000 and $4,000 are undoubtedly opposed to a consumption tax. Possibly a large majority of the remaining 700,000 tax returns of $4,000 or over for 1918 may be affected by the personal equation against a consumption tax, but of the 252,000 persons receiving over $6,000 per annum, who composed 1 per cent of the 26,000,000 voters in 1920, and the 60,000 persons receiving $10,000 or over annual income a larger portion are probably influenced by personal considerations in favor of a consumption tax, notwithstanding it violates the principle of taxing according to ability to pay.

For the sake of illustration, let us assume that the entire 60,000 people receiving over $10,000 annually favor a consumption tax because if the income tax is repealed it will relieve them of that tax burden, still 60,000 is a small proportion of the 106,000,000 people or of the 26,000,000 electors in 1920 who will directly contribute through any consumption tax.

This does not assume that taxation should be levied on the few because they are an insignificant minority compared with the many, nor does it contend that present income rates are equitably adjusted. Those are separate questions. I do contend that a consumption tax levied on the necessities of life in time of peace violates every fundamental principle of taxation and should not become law even though the 60,000 taxpayers receiving over $10,000 annual income are estimated to possess nearly one-half of all tangible property of the country, because the rights of the remainder are emphasized through that fact.

Let it be conceded that the 60,000, if that number be accepted or double that number, are among the most powerful financially and otherwise in the country. That they exercise a controlling influence on many of the leading journals of the country that mold public sentiment, and that they have a voice in legislation through propaganda which can not be counteracted by the 106,000,000, a great majority of whom are helpless to give public expression to their views excepting at the polls.

SILENCE DOES NOT MEAN CONSENT.

The silence of the many now, excepting as voiced by resolutions of which many have been received in opposition to a sales tax, does not mean they are willing to have us enact such law. They are not here as witnesses. They can not come here. The worker receiving $1,000 or under for his yearly wage has no private car and, in fact, has no means of coming in person. Neither has the farmer, whose $465 annual income was spent long before the Christmas days were reached.

These people are not here and have no means of propaganda to offset the tremendous flood for a sales tax that will be poured in on Congress. They leave us to act, responsible for our action to them. Who then can we call as unbiased witnesses?

I have a number of such witnesses who have testified on the subject. Not great financiers, publishers, or others who may have personal reasons for preferring a consumption tax to an income tax. Not the farmer back home or wage earner in the mill or in the mines, railway service, or elsewhere who is opposed to it for personal reasons, but I will call witnesses who are, generally speaking, disinterested financially. Who are not in the employ of sales tax proponents. Witnesses whose study of economic questions make them experts in their lines—disinterested experts and witnesses who have appeared and laid their case publicly before the American Congress without concealment or subterfuge but subject to questioning from some of the ablest students of taxation.

WHY HAVE A CONSUMPTION TAX ON NECESSITIES AFTER HAVING JUST REPEALED A SALES TAX ON LUXURIES?

A sales tax, with all the sugar coating of sales tax doctors, will not make the pills more palatable when the plan is fully understood and results are known. A turnover sales tax was an ultimatum first lodged with Congress by the metropolitan press last session. New York financiers like Kahn, Bache, and Rothschild kept the rails hot with private cars traveling to far off Florida to interview the President elect or else before committees, where they painted black is white against opinions of acknowledged and disinterested experts and tax authorities. They then tried by sheer force of propaganda and a whirlwind campaign to put through a turnover sales tax. When the attempt was found futile these propagandists urged a retailers' sales tax, and finally, before adjournment, they stood for a manufacturers' sales tax. This tax failed in the Senate after hard pressing by the big business bloc.

That is the tax which is to be put through Congress during the coming session if it can be forced, and a campaign of persuasion and sales-tax propaganda, which includes many metropolitan papers, is enlisted in a united effort to put over the tax. On a soldiers' compensation bill as a price for its passage such tax may be offered, with a certainty that the soldiers and their families will thus be made to pay in taxes a large part of the bonus they are to receive, or else the consumption tax may be pressed as a direct proposal, without strings.

To this proposition it is asked, Why not openly again tax luxuries and add a 20 per cent tax to a $500 fur coat rather than collect a 3 per cent to 4 per cent sales tax through a 10 per cent increased price on every pair of shoes? Why not openly add a 20 per cent tax to a $200 music box rather than secretly collect a 3 per cent to 4 per cent consumption tax through a 10 per cent or more increase in price on a $20 suit of clothes? Why not openly add a 20 per cent luxury tax to a $5,000 limousine rather than secretly collect a 4 per cent tax by a 10 per cent increased price on foodstuffs? In fact, why not deal openly and frankly, placing a large tax on luxuries bought by those best able to pay rather than secretly taxing those least able to pay on the necessities they consume? The tax will be started at 2 per cent or 3 per cent and then increased in rate when once fastened on the country, as in Canada, until the principle is repudiated, as it is certain to be when understood by the consuming public.

"Make an experiment" is the oft-repeated cry of the sales tax propagandist in the persuasive tones that a fisherman employs when trolling with his silver spoon hook for the unwary fish. Once hooked hard for a time the fight is over. It was such bait that propagandists pressed on Congress to secure a repeal of the excess-profits tax, in order to stimulate business, but, now that the tax is off, we are informed manufactures and exports are at a lower figure than ever before. The hook with its attractive bait was swallowed whole.

It was such bait that propagandists pressed on Congress to secure a reduction in surtaxes on wealth, in order to release vast amounts that would immediately enter the channels of trade. No tax student, however amateurish, swallowed the bait, because all economic laws and the amount of money involved made such promise ridiculous, but surtaxes were reduced, as we well know, and yet not one business wheel has been turned in consequence. Again, the propagandist asks us to try an experiment by laying taxes on the necessaries of life to "help business." Without a single logical argument to support the new gold-brick proposal, will Congress enact a consumption tax?

We have untaxed wealth far beyond the most sanguine hopes of those who are benefited, and now to complete the unprecedented program we are asked to put a consumption tax on the people of the country, a great majority of whom find existence a hard problem to solve during the 365 days of every year. I hold no brief for the poor or rich, but any plan that places the poor and the rich on the same level in meeting the expenses of the Federal Government is abhorrent to every sense of justice and opposed to every sound principle of taxation, while those who insist the consumer pays the tax in every case are both illogical and inaccurate in such statements.

THE CANADIAN SALES TAX.

In Canada they are experimenting with the sales tax system. Canada has a debt burden double our own per capita after deducting foreign loans due the Government and is without hundreds of great mushroom fortunes on which to draw pursuant to modern and ancient tax principles. Canada, with an experimental attempt hardly begun, is trying out a sales tax after allowing hundreds of exemptions in order to make it more palatable to her people. All Canadian tax officials, strange to say, speak well of their job, and the tax, and I offer a naïve, innocent statement of Maj. Hobart, of Montreal, who is a sales-tax official, according to the press, and has the same pride in his system that the official executioner has in his electric chair. Hobart says, "The Canadian law provides, roughly, for a 3 per cent tax on sales by manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers. Of course, the consumer pays the tax eventually, but he does not know it." A sort of tax electrocution to Hobart that is both painless and effective. Hobart describes the Government tax of 15 cents on a $5 pair of shoes as small. But no one believes that manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers who pay license fees and incur extra expense under the Canadian system and who can load on to the cost 15 cents or 50 cents, or far more, at their pleasure, where the "consumer does not know it," will limit extra charges to the legal tax. Across the border in this country illustrations have been afforded of modern profiteering ingenuity that loaded the original cost of the article several times before it reached the consumer.

Placed on chairs, cuffs, collars, churns, and on everything from chocolate and cinnamon to cement, and on shirts, shoes, socks, soap, sugar, and from sofas to both cream and steam separators, think of the war profits, and denunciation, deserved and undeserved, that would be heaped on a sales tax and on any Congress that loaded this new unprecedented burden on the people when profiteering highwaymen have established unprecedented records in the recent past.

In order to prevent a stampede from this obnoxious tax we are advised certain exemptions are granted on foodstuffs in Canada, but the camel's nose once poked under the tent will be there to stay and to be pressed further as opportunity develops in order to supplant the income tax as urged by Bache and others. If exemptions on foodstuffs are to be had at the outset, why not exemptions from a tax on boots, shoes, socks, and caps for the children? With one hand we have just taken the tax off candy and chewing gum and removed the tax burden from the garments of the rich and all taxes on luxuries, while with the other we are now asked to place an adhesive plaster of unparalleled proportion on everything the people eat, drink, wear, and use, with a few sugar-coated exemptions to be later determined. With one hand we have removed a 3 per cent tax on transportation specific and fixed, while with the other we are asked to add 3 per cent to 4 per cent secret tax with unlimited opportunities to pyramid profits.

"PAYING A TAX WITHOUT KNOWING IT."

From sales-tax propaganda there are three major reasons why a sales tax should be adopted:

First. Many financiers could thereby shift taxes to the 98 per cent.

Second. Many publishers could thereby shift taxes to the 98 per cent.

Third. Big business could thereby shift taxes to the 98 per cent.

Three minor reasons are also advanced:

First. The consumer pays all taxes.

Second. He loves country more by knowing he is taxed.

Third. Under a sales tax he does not know he pays the tax.

Ergo, the three major interests that now pay no taxes would have the consumer still pay taxes "without knowing it."

The first chapter of a consumption-tax campaign is now on. This "painless" tax "will be paid without knowing it." It will make it "a pleasure to give" and will swell our treasury vaults to bursting without anyone knowing when or how they paid the tax. This campaign of colored ribbons, banquets, and lollipops is now furnished intelligent legislators by papers and propagandists that daily, weekly, and monthly picture the beauties of a sales tax on everything we eat, drink, wear, and use. Only a little added cost to the article is an apologetic explanation to the legislator and taxpayer.

In other words, "you do not really pay the tax"; you just blissfully drift along, and first thing you know a billion dollars has been added to the Treasury from some unknown source, taken right out of the air or from under the magician's hat with a now you see it and now you don't movement that pleases, mystifies, and sometimes deludes.

We have just passed through a period of high prices and profiteering where retailers and department stores in many cases have soaked consumers and continue to soak them irrespective of costs through combinations, gentleman's agreements, exchange of prices, and other means which have contributed to the new method of doing business. Whatever the cost, we realize we are still paying from 50 per cent to 100 per cent over prewar prices on many of the necessaries of life while wages have steadily dropped or have stopped, due to unemployment, with tragic results. Only a comparatively few men with concealed income returns to which the public has no access are hauling in their profits with war-time regularity. Testimony regarding a few profiteers coming from high source is quoted:

WASHINGTON.

Protesting against the Fordney tariff bill rates on plate glass, Charles R. Sligh, a furniture manufacturer of Grand Rapids, Mich., told the Senate Finance Committee to-day that "during the carnival of high prices in 1921 the glass manufacturers, jobbers, and the manufacturers who polish and silver mirrors advanced prices to a point 540 per cent above the prices prevailing in 1915. The colossal profits acquired from these enormous advances have come from the pockets of the consumer," said the witness. Senator LA FOLLETTE asked the witness for a statement of his own profits, and Mr. Sligh promised to furnish it, but added that furniture now was being sold by his company practically at cost.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 21 Chairman FORDNEY named scores of articles purchased last month wherein the profits added by the seller and paid by the consumer frequently reached over 500 per cent. No limit through taxation or by law exists whereby the consumer can be protected from this shameless robbery, and to these unconscionable evidences of profiteering we are now asked to annex a consumption tax.

A SALES TAX IS COLLECTED THROUGH INCREASED PRICES.

A consumption tax means higher prices because it is the only way the tax can be collected by the manufacturer, who thereafter passes it on down to the jobber and wholesaler until it reaches the consumer. All the traffic will bear is added today for profits irrespective of cost, a heritage of the war, and when a sales tax is also placed on the shoulders of the consumer from the manufacturer down to the final consumer it will then add new profits where possible like the old familiar method of rolling the snowball. Profiteering prices have not disappeared, and yet we are asked by law to continue their existence by an added tax placed through those prices on every consumer in the land.

Practically every department store and many retailers may be depended upon to favor this tax because it affords a good excuse for added profits that can not be scrutinized or known by the consumer. If the article costs the consumer more than he or she expected, it will then be due to the tax levied by our Government through Congress on those who are permitted to enjoy the blessed privileges of having a bare living.

In other words, Congress has repealed the ice cream, face powder, jewelry, and other taxes heretofore openly collected by the retailer and is now asked to levy a secret tax collected all along the line through increased prices levied on the necessities of life.

I have quoted heretofore in a discussion of the sales tax authorities or testimony submitted before other organizations that have studied the effect of a sales tax from every conceivable angle, including a turnover sales tax, a wholesalers' and retailers' sales tax, and everything that comprehends a consumption tax.

Men appointed by the National Industrial Conference Board represented 25 affiliated businesses or organizations having represented assets of several billion dollars and hundreds of thousands of employees. They are tax experts and financially disinterested. They had no personal tax motives to influence their judgment. They were not employed by great wealth to speak for them as any attorney might speak for a client. These witnesses were unprejudiced. Starting out in their deliberations in favor of a sales tax, by a surprising agreement in judgment they reached a unanimous verdict against a sales tax. I submit extracts from their statements submitted to the national conference board in open session.

TESTIMONY OF TAX EXPERTS AGAINST A SALES TAX.

Arthur A. Ballantine, attorney at large, New York City, formerly Solicitor of Internal Revenue, says, page 32, hearings national industrial tax committee:

I believe that this idea of a sales tax, a tax collected everywhere, falling on no one, is a will-o'-the-wisp which has floated over this field of taxation and which is in danger of luring business men who approach Congress in an effort to get really beneficial changes into futile action instead of constructive action.

I believe that this committee, by the very careful and exhaustive consideration which it has given to the advocates of this plan and its careful thought as to conclusions, has done much to dissipate this myth and to direct the efforts of business men into practical channels instead of down a pathway which leads to futility.

For the second witness I quote from Charles A. Andrews, whose frank, clear analysis of the sales tax is illuminating. He says (p. 38):

There was on the committee no vociferous objector to the sales tax. There was on the committee nobody who was loaded to kill it. We started in upon the assumption that we were going to work out something in the form of a sales tax. We invited various well-informed people to come before us. We reached out and got printed matter and manuscripts; we made investigations; and slowly but steadily the committee was driven to the inevitable conclusion that it, representing a large body of business men, could not bring before this conference a recommendation for any form of sales tax, except as the same related to a few specific articles, suggestions as to which we have made, and which have been referred to by Mr. Armitage.

We haven't the nerve, as good citizens of the country—which we believe we are, and are trying to be—to say to a body of business men in this country, who are suggesting that business be relieved from a billion dollars of excess-profits tax, that we propose a tax which will cause the billion to be paid by the ultimate consumer. That is such a violent divergence from the principle of payment upon the basis of ability to pay that we can not ask this body of business men to get behind that sort of a tax.

We do not believe, in this day and generation—and following the World War, instead of following the Napoleonic wars—that we have any business to propose seriously to the Congress of the United States a tax of a billion dollars, or two, or three (I don't know how much it would produce—all those figures are given), to be paid by the ultimate consumer, and organized business excused from its billion dollars of excess-profits tax.

We don't think that is good citizenship; and we don't think that is good economics. That is the real reason that we disposed of or rejected the sales tax, upon the assumption that the tax is paid by the ultimate consumer.

* * * * * * *

A SALES TAX IS AN UNJUSTIFIABLE TAX ON GROSS RECEIPTS.

Well, let us assume that the tax all remained with the original payer of it, and that it is not passed on to the consumer. Does it then become a tax which we can justify ourselves in recommending to Congress? Your committee says "No." * * * Why? If the tax remains with the individual or concern which originally pays it and he is not able to pass it on, it becomes a tax measured in terms, although not so stated, of his gross receipts; and as such, in the opinion of your committee, it is open to such serious objections that we can not ask Congress to pass it. * * * A tax on gross receipts which leaves out of the equation all the difference in cost of the conduct of your business as compared to mine—perhaps it takes 90 per cent of my gross receipts to conduct my business and pay my expenses; perhaps it takes 50 per cent or 70 per cent or 95 per cent of yours—is an unjustifiable tax. * * * The establishment of a tax like that would, in the opinion of your committee, produce such inequalities that our dissatisfaction with the excess-profits tax would be as nothing, and we would find ourselves in the face of inequalities vastly greater than heretofore. * * * It is uneconomic in its nature; it is indefensible, in our opinion, in the twentieth century, if it is a general tax on all consumptions; and for other reasons it is equally indefensible if it becomes a tax in terms of gross receipts, which term means nothing so far as it relates to the ability to pay taxes.

BACHE SHOWS HOW TO AVOID A CONSUMPTION TAX.

Mr. Jules Bache, called as a hostile witness before that committee, gives his own concept of human nature and a cold-blooded alternative for the ultimate consumer who can not pay the tax. He says, "Quit consuming." I quote from his statement before the industrial committee (p. 58):

Prof. Adams this morning showed the greatest optimism that I have ever heard voiced from the tribune. He states that he believed the taxpayer was a cheerful, voluntary honest man. That is not my opinion. The taxpayer—and I am not attacking his honesty when I say so—spends 11 months a year devising schemes by which, during the 1 month that he tries to make up his tax statement he can avoid as many of the taxes as is legally possible, and he generally succeeds in avoiding many of them.

The idea of putting a thrift tax into our taxes, which the 20 per cent limitation would be, is an excellent one, but the greatest thrift tax would be the turnover tax, since if anybody didn't want to pay any taxes he could merely refrain from consuming.

THE CANADIAN TAX IS NOT A SALES TAX.

W. C. Cornwell, an employee of Mr. Bache, read a statement of the Canadian sales tax at that same meeting—page 60—to which Robert G. Wilson, chief of the tax division, American Mining Congress, immediately replied, as follows:

I don't know how many gentlemen present are familiar with the Canadian law, but it has been my fortune within the last three or four years to spend some time in Canada, and, for business reasons, make some intensive study of the Canadian law. To my mind the Canadian law is not a sales tax.

In the first place, the law of July 1, known in the United States as a sales tax, is an amendment to the special war revenue act of 1915, which is an excise tax law.

What Mr. Cornwell has had to say regarding the premier's statement is true. The statement, however, is misleading in that it refers to a sales tax which, in its effect, exempts all the prime essentials of life from such taxes; it is only an addition at the rate of 1 per cent and 2 per cent, to excise taxes—luxury taxes, if you please—which rise sometimes 50 per cent upon many commodities—luxuries, essentials, and nonessentials. It is not, as the business men's tax committee has termed the proposition, a sales tax.

The next witness, Mr. J. F. Zoller, tax attorney of the General Electric Co., says at the same committee hearings, page 62:

I want to talk just a minute on the sales tax. Now, we have reached the parting of the ways here in regard to the sales tax. Personally, I am opposed to it for the reasons stated by Mr. Andrews. I can't state those objections any better or as well as he did. But the situation as I see it is this: The people who are favoring the sales tax are those who are already required to pay a sales tax under section 900 of the present law, and their position is that if the Government can select this industry and impose a sales tax upon us, why not spread it to other taxpayers?

WHY ENGLAND REJECTS A SALES TAX.

The next witness is James J. Forstall, of Chicago, attorney at law and member of the tax committee, who speaks of efforts to pass a sales tax in Great Britain. He says (p. 67):

Comment has been made on Canada and Mexico. I would like to say that two weeks ago yesterday, through the courtesy of Prof. Haig, I had an opportunity to discuss with one of the members of the British income-tax commission and with one of the high tax officials of the British Government the question of the British taxation situation. As you probably all know, they have about as little love for the excess-profits duty as the Americans have for the excess-profits tax, and have been spending two years in trying to find a substitute, but they haven't yet found it. I asked each of those gentlemen whether the general sales tax has been considered as a substitute, and they both said the same thing: That it had been taken up and considered very seriously, but that now they were no longer considering it, because they were convinced that it was neither an equitable tax nor feasible from an administrative standpoint, nor one which could possibly be passed through Parliament.

THE CUMBERSOME MEXICAN SALES TAX LAW.

For the next witness I quote from A. E. Holcombe, New York, secretary and treasurer of the National Tax Association. He says:

I happen to have with me a copy of a bulletin which is just about to come out, and in view of the references to other countries I thought I might read a couple of sentences from the report on the Mexican situation. It seems that early in the Carranza régime he established a committee to look into the entire financial system in Mexico. That committee made an elaborate report, and it has been reviewed by Prof. Chandler, of Columbia, who spent some time himself as adviser.

It is perhaps not too much to say that the most important proposal to be found in the entire model plan (and that was the name given to this report) is that recommending the suppression of the sales tax throughout the States of Mexico. * * * It has always been a costly tax to collect, and according to the opinion of Mexican officials, who are in a position to know, it has constituted one of the most cumbersome impediments to industry and commerce.

HOW FARMERS REGARD A SALES TAX.

The next witness, J. R. Howard, of Chicago, speaks for a million and a half farmers in the American Farm Bureau Federation. He speaks the sentiments of several million other farmers not connected with the organization of which he is president. He says (p. 68):

The farmer is interested in paying his just and fair proportion of taxation. He believes every man, every citizen, should pay some tax, because it makes him a better citizen, but he believes that that taxation should be so distributed as to be fair and equitable, and in proportion to each man's ability to pay.

With regard to the sales tax, let me say that the farmer occupies a unique position. I think it has generally been conceded in this discussion that the tax is passed down to the ultimate consumer. The farmer can pass nothing to the ultimate consumer, because he buys at the other man's price and sells at the other man's price, and being at that disadvantage and not able to pass it on, he bears an unjust burden and is in a place where I am sure he, as a farmer, will object to the broad extension of the sales-tax principle.

Mr. H. C. McKenzie, of Walton, N. Y., a member of the tax committee, seconded Mr. Howard's testimony in vigorous language, as follows:

I want to take the opportunity to emphasize the farmer's objections to a general sales tax, which have been voiced by our president, Mr. Howard, and to call your attention to just two or three things briefly. * * * The chief proponent of the sales tax has told you that the excess-profits tax is not only paid by the ultimate consumer but that the ultimate consumer pays the tax two or three times in amount. Now, if that is right, the corporations and people who are doing this business are receiving a benefit from the excess-profits tax, and the corporations and business people are the people who are asking for its repeal; they are asking for something that is diametrically opposed to their own interests. According to the chief proponents of the sales tax, the sales tax is paid by the ultimate consumer in its entirety; that is his proposition, as I understand it.

Now, your proposition, as developed by the advocates of the sales tax, is this: To take an approximate $1,000,000,000 off the excess-profits tax, which is now paid, as I contend, largely by the corporations, and put it over, according to the proponents of the sales tax, on the ultimate consumer. It seems to me that nothing could be more short-sighted, and tend in the end to be a boomerang, and to be a disadvantage not only to business but to capital than to strive to shift the burden of a billion dollars from the business people who now pay it to the living wage—which is what it amounts to—the ultimate consumer. Ninety per cent or 95 per cent of that tax will be paid out of the living wage, if the contention of the proponents of the sales tax is correct; and I want to say that the farmers who are represented in the American Farm Bureau Federation will never in the world stand for that proposition.

"FARMERS WILL FIGHT TO THE END."

Let me interject a witness at this point whose tenderness for wealth and capital has no conspicuous place in his published statement, from which I quote. I offer an extract from an article given to the press by George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers' National Council, an organization representing an enormous constituency. No one will doubt that equally forceful demands are voiced by the millions of organized and unorganized labor who are to be placed in the new class of turnover sales taxpayers. Mr. Hampton says:

A direct tax could be levied upon capital values, and should be promptly levied by Congress instead of seeking some method of placing additional burdens of taxation through a retail sales tax, a general sales tax, and other consumption taxes upon the hundreds of thousands of families who to-day are receiving several hundreds of dollars less than they need to maintain the American standard of living. * * * A retail sales tax and other sales taxes and all similar taxes on food, clothing, and shelter, called consumption taxes, must be paid chiefly by the workers on the farms, in factories, mines, and transportation, millions of whom are getting less than the minimum wage necessary to maintain a family on a decent American standard.

Mr. Hampton concludes:

The full money cost of the war must be paid by taxes on incomes, corporation profits, estates, and privileges. Such taxes will yield $7,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 a year for many years without imposing any hardship upon anyone. American farmers, who this year have lost billions through the slump in farm prices, will fight to the end the plan for the selfish privileged interests to saddle the huge war debt upon our people for years, and insist upon prompt payment of that debt by those who profited so hugely by the war and by the monopolies built up in this country before and during the war.

A RECOGNIZED GREAT TAX AUTHORITY ON THE SALES TAX.

I could quote from many other witnesses before the board, who have not "wabbled and wavered" for months, but the witnesses I have cited against the sales tax are tax students and authorities, men who have given the question thorough consideration in most cases, are apparently unprejudiced, and whose views are of great value in determining matters of taxation. One of the greatest international tax authorities, whose textbooks are known to every student of taxation, has expressed himself on the subject of a sales tax. His contribution on the sales tax here and abroad is concise, fair, and positive. I quote from the statement of Dr. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University (national industrial tax committee hearings, p. 72):

The sales tax is not a novel tax, as the Premier of Canada said. If he had followed an academic course in taxation he could have learned of many examples, dating back as far as thousands of years ago. The Romans had it, not to speak of the Egyptians and the Babylonians. I do not want to give a lecture on taxation; I am simply trying to call attention to the fact that the sales tax has existed in one form or another for a great many years. With only two exceptions, it has been abolished everywhere and has not been reintroduced in any first-class country, and those two exceptions are Germany, which reintroduced it in 1919, and France, which, as has been said, introduced it in 1920. Now, before we consider the experiences with this tax, it must be remembered that we can learn little one way or another, either for or against it, from Mexico, or Cuba, or the Philippines, or Canada, all of which are countries of insignificant economic proportions, where we do not find the real kind of sales tax that we have been discussing to-day.

DEMOCRACIES OPPOSE SALES TAX LAWS.

Again (p. 74):

The proposition now is to take off one of those three chief categories—the tax on excess profits—and remove the burden from profits on wealth or income, and put it on the other or consumption side. This would, in my opinion, unduly shift the balance and bring us too near the position formerly occupied by all the aristocracies of old, and still reflected in some of the European countries. * * * (P. 75:) Why is it that England and America show their democracy, their real democracy, so much more than countries in the difficult position of Italy, or France, or Germany? There you will find throughout the war, and even now, the great mass of taxes imposed upon the consumption of the common man; whereas in England and in the United States during the Great War, as over against our experiences in the Civil War, the great majority of taxes are raised from wealth; that is, from those who can afford to pay, rather than from the consumption of the necessaries and comforts of life. * * * After the United States, the two countries of the world which are making the most progress in fiscal reform are England and Italy—for Italy is doing better than France. When these two countries came to consider this problem they went into the question of a sales tax thoroughly and finally rejected it. On the other hand, the two big countries of the world that have adopted the sales tax, Germany and France, did so only as a last resort, after exhausting every other available source of taxation. * * * Germany was forced to this sales tax in the last extremity, and in France the same is true. * * * I have been in California for eight months, and had the pleasure some time ago of addressing a large body of business men in San Francisco assembled to discuss this question. I found that the situation was precisely that which was presented by our committee. Everyone was anxious to get rid of the profits tax, everyone had heard that here was a way out, and it captivated them all; every man in that room was in favor of a general sales tax. But after I had talked with them, not so much in opposition as trying to show that there was another side of the question which they must begin to study, it was marvelous to see what a change came over them; not because I spoke—because everyone would have done just as well—but simply because attention was now called to some of the less obvious aspects of the case.

A sales tax on the sales of capital would ruin New York City as the financial center of the country. A sales tax on the necessaries of life would evoke a political struggle the like of which we have never seen in this country (p. 77).

The sales tax represents an attempt to put an undue, an extravagant burden upon the consumer, instead of on the producer or the possessor of wealth (p. 79).

Dr. Seligman discloses why Messrs. Kahn, Bache, Rothschild, and others of like antecedents from the "aristocracies of old" favor a sales tax.

I will willingly leave my colleagues in Congress to say whose advice is to be considered. Shall it be that of a man whose judgment is not warped by personal or pecuniary interests, who handles the subject with the mind of a master; Seligman, whose opinion is supported by two great tax-investigating committees, by the experts of the Treasury, who have spoken through Secretary Houston, and by a dozen reputable witnesses quoted?

UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The United States Chamber of Commerce is a large organization including separate chambers in every large city of the country. Ordinarily nine out of ten of the hundred thousand or more individual members pay an income tax. It is a great organization for modern propaganda. No matter what proposal may be before Congress the United States Chamber of Commerce, with its conceded powerful organization, carries weight.

It conducts "referendums" that are supposed to reflect the views of individual units, but frequently they no more reflect the careful judgment of individual members than the average petition which men are reputed to have signed to hang themselves.

The United States Chamber of Commerce in 1920 appointed a committee of nine exceptionally able men, including tax experts, to advise the chamber, and incidentally Congress, on the most satisfactory tax proposal that could be offered.

While the attention of the committee was largely devoted to a turnover sales tax, it considered every variety of tax that could be presented, and finally that committee, like the committee appointed by the National Industrial Conference Board, came to a unanimous vote against a sales tax.

Its members had every reason from personal interest doubtless to favor a consumption tax, but after many weeks' consideration they, too, unanimously agreed that a sales tax was unjust and vicious, because it violated the tax principle of taxing according to ability to pay. From that report unanimously agreed to, I quote:

REPUDIATES PRINCIPLE OF TAXING ACCORDING TO ABILITY TO PAY.

Perhaps the greatest inequity, however, would appear in the proportionate results of any of the taxes here under consideration upon the person with small income as compared with the person of large income. At the bottom of the economic scale are persons whose income barely suffices to provide them with necessities of the poorest quality and in the smallest amount, and at the other end of the scale are persons whose expenditures for necessities, no matter how large, represent but a fraction of their income. Any tax falling upon general expenditures is consequently disproportionately heavier for persons of smaller incomes as compared with persons of larger incomes. To the extent sales taxes of the sorts that have been suggested were used as a general source of revenue there would be a departure from the principle that taxes should be levied in accordance with ability to pay.

OF DOUBTFUL LEGALITY.

Finally, there would seem to be legal difficulties in the way of a general sales tax. Opinions handed down by the Supreme Court in March and June of this year make it clear that such a tax is not authorized by the income-tax amendment to the Constitution. Whether or not it would be held by the courts to be an indirect tax is uncertain; if it were held to be a direct tax, it would, under the Constitution, have to be apportioned among the States in accordance with their population, an obviously impracticable procedure. Reliance for revenues in large amount should not in any event be placed upon a tax regarding the legality of which there is doubt.

After the two committees appointed by these great aggregations of capital and financial influence had made report against any sales tax a strong movement occurred among individual members of the chamber of commerce to set aside the findings of its committee. Self-interest again became a striking factor and propaganda among the various member units in favor of a sales tax was showered on them from interested agencies. When the referendum was taken the members, who had heard little against the sales tax, voted as follows:

On the referendum, Should a sales tax be substituted for an excess-profits tax? 702½ for and 857½ against.

Should a sales tax be levied in addition to an excess-profits tax? 767½ for and 894 against.

The United States Chamber of Commerce voted against a sales tax when the question was first presented to its membership by a referendum, notwithstanding it represents the wealth of the country and had been persistently hammered for a contrary verdict.

Again the same interests showered sales-tax propaganda on individual members of the chamber and demanded another referendum. Again tremendous pressure, now being exercised on Congress, came from the same self-interested agencies in favor of the tax, and finally a second referendum was returned against the unanimous report of the chamber's committee of tax experts that has rejected a sales tax.

All of which proves that the chamber of commerce will respond to propaganda, and if sufficiently sustained, irrespective of its merits, a decision may be had that will utterly repudiate the value of its experts or of its judgment first rendered. Will Congress be equally subservient?

THAT 23 PER CENT EXCESS-PROFITS TAX "JUDICIALLY DETERMINED."

It has been a frequent argument offered by sales-tax advocates that all taxes, whether certain or indefinite in amount, are eventually paid by the consumer irrespective of comparative business ability, efficiency, or competition between sellers, and that an average increase in price of 23 per cent, according to the Department of Justice, occurred through the excess-profits tax. Increased prices frequently reached 230 per cent and over, but had no relation to the tax, according to experts.

I do not intend to discuss any statement regarding a 23 per cent addition to cover the excess-profits tax, because a moment's consideration will evidence the absurdity of this argument advanced by sales-tax advocates. Ten thousand experts could not ascertain any average tax added to profits by hundreds of thousands of excess-profits taxpayers on many millions of sales where costs and selling prices fluctuate and profits reach from several hundred per cent, as quoted by Mr. FORDNEY to the House, to 540 per cent, quoted by Mr. Sligh, as herein set forth. Treasury experts laugh at the 23 per cent proposition still seriously quoted by sales-tax advocates, but I offer the best evidence of its unreliability in a letter from the Department of Justice, from which I quote:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1921.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of May 30, 1921, in which you request a copy of any statement made by this department in regard to the effect of the excess-profits tax upon the cost of living, I have to advise you that after a thorough search of the files and records of the department, I have been unable to trace the report in question. I am, however, having a further search made, and have written to former officials of the department requesting that they furnish me with information which you require. I shall be very glad to give you any data that is available upon this subject if any such shall come to light in the near future.

I may say that I have been in touch with the statistical bureaus of the various departments of the Government in this city, but have not succeeded in securing any data whatsoever upon the subject of the effect of this tax on the cost of living.

Very truly, yours,

GUY D. GOFF,
Assistant to the Attorney General.

No further word on the subject has been received, although the same response was offered to others in search of the same information. In other words, profiteering uses tax laws only as an excuse to charge consumers all that the traffic will bear.

SALES TAX WITNESSES AT CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS.

Quotations from disinterested witnesses opposed to a sales tax have been offered, as evidenced by public hearings of the national industrial tax conference.

Many of these same witnesses and others appeared before the Senate Finance Committee last May, and the hearings afford a reasonably complete legislative textbook on the subject of a sales tax. Men of unimpeached standing and ability repudiated any sales-tax proposal, although the hearings frequently related to a turnover sales tax, which is an exaggerated manufacturers' jobbers tax. It is, however, subject to the same fundamental objections of pyramiding, profiteering, secrecy, inflation of prices, and burden on consumption.

Printed hearings covering over 200 pages are devoted to arguments by many witnesses opposed to a sales tax. From these I quote briefly from several witnesses on different phases of the same subject to indicate the many objections that exist to this consumption tax:

PRESIDENT PLUMB, OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD.

(Page 277.)

J. C. Peacock, Albee Building, Washington, D. C., representing Mr. Fayette R. Plumb, president of Fayette R. Plumb (Inc.), Philadelphia: "I might explain just why Mr. Plumb intended to appear here himself. He is unable to come to-day and has asked me to take his place. Mr. Plumb, a prominent manufacturer of Philadelphia, is interested in this subject, not so much on his own account but because he served as chairman of the tax committee of the National Industrial Conference Board, of which committee I happened to serve as secretary, and copies of the final report were sent some time ago to all Members of Congress, including, of course, members of this committee." * * *

I can say, from my own knowledge, that Mr. Plumb was personally a very strong advocate of the sales tax, * * * but as that committee went into the subject more and more * * * it realized that in making its report it could not properly make a report favoring a sales tax or any form of the sales tax unless it could satisfy itself in its mind that the objections which were raised were not insuperable, * * * and Mr. Plumb personally, and most of the members of the committee, finally came to the conclusion that a sales tax was unwise and impracticable.

I make that explanation in order that you might realize that what I say and what I present for Mr. Plumb * * * is from a man who started not from the position of an opponent of the sales tax but from the position of a very ardent advocate of the sales tax, * * * reached the conclusion that his first idea was wrong and that he had to change it.

Senator SMOOT. Have you got any of Mr. Plumb's arguments in favor of the sales tax?

Mr. PEACOCK. Yes; I have them here—in favor of or against?

Senator SMOOT. Oh, I wanted some in favor, and then I could judge what changed his mind. He was an awfully strong advocate of it for years, and he must during that time have written some very strong articles for it. * * *

Mr. PEACOCK. I think I have made the statement—and if I did not make it clear I will state that Mr. Plumb, like most business men, a year ago favored the sales tax. * * * I might say of my own personal knowledge for about two months when I first became associated with the committee Mr. Plumb was a very ardent advocate before that committee of the sales tax, and during that time I will also say that several meetings of the committee were devoted to conferences across the table with some of the leading advocates of the sales tax at that time. Mr. Rothschild and Mr. Lord attended the meetings of the committee, and not merely attended but took active part in the discussions of the committee. * * *

As some of you may perhaps remember, about four or five years ago it was my privilege to assist this committee in the capacity of legislative draftsman, and also the House Committee on Ways and Means, and during that time I had the privilege of assisting in drafting both the revenue act of 1916 and 1917.

Mr. PEACOCK. Mr. Plumb points out that the most unfair thing about this tax and the thing which makes it fundamentally unsound is that it conforms neither to the principle of ability to pay or to the principle of benefits received. * * *

(Page 287.)

Mr. Plumb refers to a matter which may have been brought to your attention; if not, you will probably want to look further into it. [Reading:]

"It is interesting to know that not only American business men, when they see both sides of this question, see the unfairness of the sales tax, but also that the greatest organization of manufacturers in Great Britain—that is, the Federation of British Industries—came to the same conclusion." * * *

Mr. PEACOCK. That is an experience almost identical with the experience of our own national industrial tax committee; and I can say this because I know from my own knowledge that they, not having seen a copy of this report, used that very same word "reluctant" in their report. They started out and wanted to report favorably to the sales tax, and they were forced in the report I have mentioned to use the word "reluctant." They could not do it.

THE CREDIT MEN OPPOSE A SALES TAX.

R. G. ELLIOTT, REPRESENTING 33,000 "BUSINESS UNITS."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, the National Association of Credit Men is an organization of 33,000 business units—manufacturers, mining companies, wholesalers, and financial institutions. Our membership is made up of the business units and is not an organization of individuals.

The committee on Federal taxation, of which I happen to be chairman, was organized just a little more than three years ago, and has been very active ever since in the study and discussion with our various members at their various meetings on the subject of Federal revenue. * * *

It is true that while at the outset of our study of taxation we were more or less impressed with the seeming simplicity of a tax on business transactions; nevertheless, after we had given the subject very careful thought, we came to the conclusion, which seems to us inevitable and which is concurred in by many of the other organizations, that it would not be a practical method of raising a large amount of Government revenue; that it would not be equitable; that it would not be sound; that it would be bad for business in general. * * *

The committee, which was spoken of here this morning, of the National Industrial Conference Board, with whom I had the pleasure of sitting throughout their meetings last year, also, as you know, came to that conclusion. The wholesale grocers of the State of New York passed a resolution condemning the sales and turnover tax. Also I believe the wholesale grocers of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, if I am correct in that, passed a similar resolution a short time ago. The bulletin of the Retail Grocers' Association states that the retail grocers are opposed to it.

It might be interesting to note that I have just last evening received a telegram from the Cotton Yarn Merchants' Association of Philadelphia, in which they state:

"Understand you are representing Credit Men's Association as opposed to sales tax. Cotton Yarn Merchants' Association also opposed. Would like to cooperate with you. If can be of assistance, please advise us by wire."

I simply mention those things as indicative of the widespread feeling on the part of a great many business men that the sales tax is not the savior of the situation.

H. R. M'KENZIE, REPRESENTING AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, OPPOSES A SALES TAX.

Mr. McKENZIE. I speak for the American Farm Bureau Federation, which has between one and two million members and represents, roughly, about 5,000,000 people in this country. We think that any changes made in our present tax system should be made in view of four general principles: (1) That a man's net income is the true measure of his ability to pay taxes in support of the National Government; (2) that the rates should be progressive; that is, that the larger the man's income the higher the rate; (3) that as this is the country of all the people everybody should have some part in supporting the Government, and that a certain portion of the taxes can therefore justly be raised through the tariff and other consumption taxes; and (4) while recognizing that the raising of the revenue is the first consideration in any tax scheme, the taxes should be so laid as to tend, as far as practicable, to the distribution of wealth in the hands of the many and not to its concentration in the hands of the few.

We want to draw clearly the difference between income and consumption taxes, because we think there is a vital difference which should be kept in mind. If my memory serves me correctly, in 1919 seventy-three and a fraction per cent of the taxes were raised through income and excess-profits taxes and about twenty-six and a fraction per cent through consumption taxes. We think that that proportion is approximately correct as far as principle (3) that I have enunciated is concerned.

Senator McCUMBER. You do not think that 73 per cent of the income and excess-profits taxes were not finally paid by the ultimate consumer and is not finally a consumption tax?

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to answer that by asking you a question. You are asking that on the theory that all taxes are ultimately passed on to the consumer?

Senator McCUMBER. I am asking that because I want to find out if there is any tax that is levied against either an industry or an article.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; there are such taxes; I believe that if you change the taxing basis from net income to a sales tax you have done what President Harding in his message referred to when he said, "The country does not expect and will not approve a shifting of burdens," that you will be shifting very largely the burden from those who are able to pay to the pockets of those who are not able to pay. You will be relieving the banker, the broker, the great newspapers of part of their taxes and shifting them to other shoulders. These are the people who are urging the sales tax. * * *

Mr. McKENZIE. We believe that this general sales tax is unsound in principle; that it is unsound economically; that it is unsound from a social standpoint; and it is governmentally inexpedient. * * *

Senator McLEAN. Then you think the excess-profits tax has resulted in raising prices to the ultimate consumer?

Mr. McKENZIE. Not to the extent claimed for it. You are familiar with the statement attributed to the Department of Justice that the excess-profits tax added 23.2 per cent to the cost of living. I sent an investigator to the department to see what basis there was for these figures and he reports that he saw Mr. Reid, and that they have made a thorough investigation of their files and have not been able to run down any reference whatever to this percentage. I would like to suggest that the committee thoroughly looked into this.

Senator McLEAN. The excess-profits tax can not legitimately be charged back to prices. * * * Nevertheless, I think the going was good and it was used as an excuse for raising prices.

Mr. McKENZIE. Most of them did not need any excuse. They took all the traffic would stand.

Senator McLEAN. Very likely you are correct about that, but as long as we maintain excess-profits taxes they will continue to use it as an excuse.

Mr. McKENZIE. And they will continue to get all the traffic will bear if it is repealed. * * *

(Page 315.)

Mr. McKENZIE. As a matter of fact, you gentlemen who are familiar with the French taxation system know that they have a sales tax over there, and that since it went into effect last July it has not produced half of the money that it was estimated to produce. * * * I think the French are just as good tax collectors as we are, and I think we would get about the same general proportion of taxes from the general sales tax as from the soda-water tax.

Senator JONES. Where do you get those figures from with regard to the collection in France?

Mr. McKENZIE. Here are the figures that you asked for. That tax went into effect in July. For the months of July and August the estimated receipts were 700,000,000 francs. The actual receipts were 292,791,500 francs. For the month of September the estimates were 460,000,000 francs. The actual returns were 234,000,434 francs. For the month of October the estimates were 460,000,000 francs and the actual returns were 205,492,000 francs. For the month of February the estimates were 413,000,000 francs and the actual yield 151,571,000 francs. That shows how the sales tax is being enforced in France. That information is issued by Dow, Jones & Co., of the Wall Street Journal, and, as I understand it, the figures were gotten by one of the very large bankers in New York. * * *

Senator CALDER. I would like to get the people back to you if I could.

Mr. McKENZIE. You can if you make farming profitable.

Senator SMOOT. You referred to the Canadian taxation, and thought it was very much better than our taxation or proposed taxation.

Mr. McKENZIE. You say I thought it was better?

Senator SMOOT. Better than the proposed sales tax.

Mr. McKENZIE. No; you misunderstood me. What I said was that they had no retail sales taxes. They had abolished them all.

* * * * * * *

Senator SIMMONS. If it should be decided to eliminate the excess-profits tax and to greatly reduce the surtax and the income tax, have you made any calculation as to what the wealthy in this country will pay? * * * (Continuing, p. 329): Have you made any calculation as to what amount would be left for the wealthy to pay? To my mind very little would be left. The bulk of the taxes raised in this country would then be paid as consumption taxes and there would be very little left. If you eliminate these two things, it would be raised through impositions that will have to be paid by the wealthy class.

Mr. McKENZIE. If I get your question rightly, what I anticipate would happen if those things should be done, instead of having 75 per cent of our taxes come from incomes and excess-profits taxes and 25 per cent come from consumption taxes, you would have about 75 per cent of the tax put on the common people and 25 per cent or less on the wealthy.

NATIONAL GRANGE ALSO OPPOSED TO A SALES TAX—T. C. ATKESON, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE.

The National Grange is opposed to a general sales tax in any form, and I am authorized to present its opposition by two resolutions which were adopted at its last annual meeting at Boston, Mass., in November, 1920, which resolutions were presented to the session, referred to the appropriate committee, thoroughly considered by such committee, reported back to the general body, and, after full consideration, adopted by unanimous vote.

The first resolution reads as follows:

"The grange opposes the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution therefor of a tax on sales or any similar tax law."

You will note that this resolution also opposes the repeal of the excess-profits tax, a subject which is also before this committee.

The second resolution was this:

"The grange opposes a general sales tax because in effect it is a consumption tax and adds an unfair burden to all purchasers without reference to their ability to pay."

These resolutions were not the only action of the National Grange on the subject of taxation at its last session. Its position upon the ever present question of taxation is not a matter of recent consideration or sudden determination. The tax program of the National Grange has been before the annual sessions of that body and before the various annual sessions will show the development of a sane and constructive tax program based upon equity and fair distribution of the tax burdens, having in mind that the first principle of taxation should be justice between individuals and the second principle, distribution according to ability to pay. * * *

Against this general sales tax in any and every form some of the largest and most representative organizations in the country are aligned. Among them will be found farmers generally. The National Grange declaration is typical of the general farmer opposition. Every other farmers' organization of which we have a record which has taken any action at all has adopted resolutions opposing this tax. All the agricultural newspapers are opposed to this tax. All of the labor organizations are on record in opposition to it. Every organization of consumers of which I have any information is in opposition to it. One of the most representative, if not the most representative, research organization representing the great national industries—I refer to the National Industrial Conference Board—after a thorough investigation, went on record in opposition to this tax. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has conducted one referendum which resulted in a considerable majority against the sales tax, then took up the matter at its recent convention in Atlantic City, where its tax committee could not justify a resolution in favor of the sales tax but ordered another referendum.

If, in a democracy, legislation is supposed to be determined by the wishes of a majority of the individuals and not by a majority of the wealth, the above showing answers the question as to whether or not this Congress will pass general sales tax legislation.

FARMERS' NATIONAL COUNCIL OPPOSED TO A SALES TAX—BENJAMIN C. MARSH, REPRESENTING THE PEOPLE'S RECONSTRUCTION LEAGUE AND FARMERS' NATIONAL COUNCIL.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent, Mr. Marsh?

Mr. MARSH. I represent the People's Reconstruction League and the Farmers' National Council.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you?

Mr. MARSH. I can not tell you exactly. I know this, that there are upward of 3,000,000 members of the organizations whose officers or chief executives are members of the executive committee of the People's Reconstruction League.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you got a list of your membership?

Mr. MARSH. We have a list of the organizations, and they know what membership they have in each organization. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. I would be very glad to know how many you represent, and whether they are carried on the roll of membership, and just where your credentials are. Anyone can come in here with a fancy name of some league and claim they represent the earth.

Mr. MARSH. We make no such claims and no such pretensions. The officers and executive committee of the People's Reconstruction League are: President, Hon. Herbert F. Baker, president Farmers' National Council; vice presidents, Wm. H. Johnston, president International Association of Machinists; C. C. Connolly, president United Farmers of America; Mrs. Florence Kelley; general manager, George P. Hampton, managing director Farmers' National Council; treasurer, Jackson H. Ralston; executive secretary, Benjamin C. Marsh, secretary Farmers' National Council. Executive committee: The officers and Warren S. Stone, grand chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; William Bouck, master Washington State Grange; E. H. Fitzgerald, grand president Brotherhood Railway and Steamship Clerks; E. F. Grable, grand president United Brotherhood Maintenance of Way Employees; Timothy Healy, president International Brotherhood Stationary Firemen and Oilers; J. W. Kline, president International Brotherhood Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers, and Helpers of America; E. C. Lasater; Arthur Le Sueur; J. H. McGill; James P. Noonan, international president Brotherhood Electrical Workers; R. W. H. Stone, president North Carolina Farmers' Union; L. E. Sheppard, president Order Railway Conductors; Frank P. Walsh; T. C. Cashen, international president Switchmen's Union of North America; J. A. Franklin, international president International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Shipbuilders, and Helpers of America; John McParland, president International Typographical Union; John A. Voll, president Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of United States and Canada; Charles B. Stillman, president American Federation of Teachers.

We assert that there is no need for a sales tax or for any other tax upon consumption, and I shall quote the figures to show it.

In 1918, the last year for which official figures are available, the net income of those subject to the personal income tax was $15,924,639,399, of which, in round figures, $4,848,000,000 was income from property. Just over two-thirds of the total income from profit, or $3,259,000,000, was received by the 478,952 persons, each of whom had a net income of over $5,000.

Now, gentlemen, while you are considering any additional taxes upon the workers of the country—and mind you, there are several millions with dependents and certainly 10 per cent of the population of America is either out of employment to-day or on part time—you are going to make them pay taxes by levying on their meager savings or upon what they borrow.

Now, what about the wealthy? Each of the 245 individuals who received an income during 1918 of $500,000 or more had, on the average, an income of $399,359 left after paying his income tax in 1919, while the 3,013,816 families having an income of $1,000 to $3,000 had an average of only $1,926 left. In other words, the 245 persons who had an income of $500,000 and up to $50,000,000 or more therefore had left on the average two hundred and seven times as much income apiece after paying their income tax last year as the 3,000,000 individuals and families who had incomes of $1,000 to $3,000.

The 245 persons, each of whom had an income in excess of $500,000 in 1918, received on the average an income from property of $1,038,816 plus on the average an income from "personal service and business" of $285,637, a total average, without deductions, of $1,323,453.

WHAT AN INHERITANCE TAX WILL REACH.

I am going to quote from a representative Wall Street journal an article in the September 11, 1908, issue of Commerce and Finance, published then at 15 Wall Street by the Theodore H. Price Publishing Corporation. I read from an article on "A national inheritance tax law," by Mr. Richard Spillane. Mr. Spillane says that there are 10 American millionaires possessors of fortunes of $125,000,000 or more, with an estimated total wealth for these 10 of $2,500,000,000. He gives a total classification of 22,696 millionaires having, in 1918, an estimated wealth of $68,056,250,000. He estimates at that time, and his paper did, the total wealth of America as $250,000,000,000. We now place it, and the Commerce and Finance does, at $500,000,000,000 instead of $250,000,000,000. Mr. Spillane asked this question: "Would a 40 per cent tax be excessive in the case of a $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 fortune? Not much. Money accumulates rapidly. A tax of 40 per cent would take $400,000,000 for the State and leave $600,000,000 for distribution among the heirs. It is reasonable to suppose that within five years the $600,000,000 would grow to $700,000,000 or $800,000,000."

Commenting on his statement that that wealth would increase from $600,000,000 to $800,000,000 in five years, he says of this tax, "there is nothing confiscatory in that."

On the same basis which justified Commerce and Finance, which is a very careful publication, in estimating the wealth of these 23,000 millionaires in 1918 at $68,000,000,000, we estimate their wealth to-day at, approximately, $156,000,000,000, or nearly ten times our net national debt and over 27 per cent of the national wealth. A heavy Federal estate or personal tax would easily yield at least $20,000,000,000 within the next 10 years and from two and a half to three billion dollars a year for the next few years, and Congress should promptly enact an estate tax that would yield this amount.

RAILWAY TRAINMEN OPPOSED TO A SALES TAX—W. M. CLARK, REPRESENTING THE FOUR TRAIN-SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I am Mr. W. M. Clark and I represent the four train-service organizations. I have a very brief statement that I would like to submit to the committee and have it appear as a matter of record. It is very brief and perhaps it might be all right if I should make my statement first.

The CHAIRMAN. You reside here in Washington, do you, Mr. Clark?

Mr. CLARK. I do not reside here, but I am stationed here and have been for the last eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by being stationed here?

Mr. CLARK. We have our offices here; that is, the representatives of the four train-service organizations, in connection with legislative work. We have had our offices here for nearly nine years.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your position?

Mr. CLARK. I am vice president of the Order of Railway Conductors of America and national legislative representative.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers?

Mr. CLARK. I am speaking for the four train-service organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed now.

Mr. CLARK (reading):

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in appearing before you to-day we do so as the representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, whose membership consists of, approximately, 600,000 citizens of the United States. These members and their families are vitally interested in the question of taxation or any other question which may have a tendency to increase their existing cost of living.

"The question of the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution therefor of a sales or turnover tax has been called to the attention of the membership of the organizations we represent and an expression from them asked for, with the result that we find unanimous response from this membership being opposed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax and likewise unalterably opposed to the enactment of a sales or turnover tax law.

"The working people or those dependent upon wages and small salaries, or, in fact, those with small incomes, are being put to a severe test to make ends meet, and, in fact, many of them are running behind and going in debt every day, and this, coupled with the serious unemployment situation, materially affects the general welfare of the great masses of our citizenship. Therefore, this class of our people can not stand increased burdens brought about by increased taxation, which we believe will be the result of the enactment of a sales or turnover tax law."

Senator SMOOT. Have you given this any special attention yourself?

Mr. CLARK. I am somewhat familiar with it, Senator.

Senator SMOOT. Can you tell me how it is going to increase the burdens?

Mr. CLARK. Well, because it places additional taxes and burdens on the people who are the least able to pay.

Senator SMOOT. You say that just as a matter of fact?

Mr. CLARK. As a matter of conviction.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very smooth phrase.

Senator SMOOT. It is very nice, indeed; but where the sales tax will impose a 1 per cent tax upon you people, the existing laws will impose 3 or 4, and, of course, you do not want that relief.

Mr. CLARK. Well, Senator, I find that there is a vast difference of opinion on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. How much do you estimate the sales tax will bring into the Treasury?

Mr. CLARK. I have not figured that out to a definite conclusion. You gentlemen who have figured it out are better able to speak on that point.

Senator CURTIS. Those who have figured it out do not agree.

Mr. CLARK. I have heard it said that lawyers do not agree at all times. However, that is not germane to the subject.

"We are satisfied that the very least that could be hoped to be accomplished by a 1 per cent sales or turnover tax would be about $8 per capita, and that, based on the average American family of five, would be a minimum of $40 per year; and we are inclined to believe that this would be increased to probably the sum of $200 per year to each family, the whole burden being borne by the consumers or the great masses of the people who are least able to pay these costs.

"With the constant agitation for a reduction in wages, cheap labor, the relief from taxation of 'big business' and large estates that is now permeating our country, to add to this the further agitation for a sales or turnover tax, it seems that the great masses of American workingmen and their families are facing a most serious and far-reaching economic problem. This makes the masses of the people, which are the working men and women in industry and agriculture, believe that there is a constant, well-defined, and well-organized effort on the part of the special interests or classes to escape the burdens of taxation and shift them to the masses of the people in order that they may add to and continue to enjoy their already amassed wealth and fortunes."

The CHAIRMAN. That is a pure demagogic statement, in my opinion.

Mr. CLARK. I have only a few more lines.

"This sows the seeds of discontent and leads the people to believe that this Government is drifting rapidly to class legislation and class domination.

"The membership of these organizations is not seeking to evade its duties or responsibilities and is willing to meet its just obligations to its country and its institutions, but we are most earnestly opposed to further burdens being placed on the people for the benefit of the few and in order that the few or the privileged class may be permitted to live in luxury and escape their responsibilities.

"In conclusion we desire to place the membership of these four engine, train, and yard service organizations squarely on record as being opposed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax and unalterably opposed to the enactment of any form of sales or turnover tax. We trust that your honorable committee will not recommend any such plan nor that the Congress will enact any such legislation.

"Respectfully,

"W. M. CLARK,
"Vice President and National Legislative Representative,
"Order of Railway Conductors.

"H. E. WILLS,
"Assistant Grand Chief Engineer and
"National Legislative Representative,
"Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

"P. J. MCNAMARA,
"Vice President and National Legislative Representative,
"Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers.

"W. N. DOAK,
"Vice President and National Legislative Representative,
"Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen."

The CHAIRMAN. Have these orders ever had a meeting and passed resolutions expressing the sentiments that you have embodied in this statement?

Mr. CLARK. They have met and come to the conclusions submitted herein, and have come to the executives of these organizations outlining their position and attitude.

COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURERS AND MERCHANTS OPPOSED TO A SALES TAX—WALTER W. LIGGETT, CHICAGO, ILL., REPRESENTING THE COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURERS AND MERCHANTS OF CHICAGO.

Mr. LIGGETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to make it particularly plain to you that in appearing here against the sales tax I do not appear as an individual. I am the authorized spokesman of the Committee of Manufacturers and Merchants of Chicago on Federal Taxation, and also of the Farmers' Federal Tax League of America.

The Committee of Manufacturers and Merchants on Federal Taxation, which has headquarters in Chicago, has a membership of more than 30,000 business men, representing some of the most solid and reputable firms in the United States.

The Farmers' Federal Tax League of America, of which Lieut. Gov. George F. Cummings, of Wisconsin, is president, also has a very representative membership of practically all the agricultural States in the Union. * * *

The National Association of Credit Men, which is an organization which is fairly representative of American business and industry, has also taken strong ground against a sales tax. I submit as representative of the views of this organization the following statement by Mr. J. H. Trego, its executive secretary:

"Why should spending rather than saving be taxed?" That is the question puzzling J. H. Trego, executive secretary of the National Association of Credit Men. Writing to the 33,000 manufacturers, wholesalers, and bankers composing the membership of the organization, Mr. Trego has the following to say regarding the proposed sales tax:

"We have heard advocates of the sales tax say that spending and not saving should be taxed. Let us look a while and see whether this is a real common-sense and fair statement. Inordinate spending and inordinate saving are equally bad. One is prodigal and the other is miserly. If spending is necessary, if common-sense spending is important to the commerce and industries of a people, why should spending rather than saving be taxed? It is not a fair proposition, in our opinion, and when you consider a man with a large family who must spend more than a man with a smaller family to impose a tax on sales is inequitable and unfair. It seems strange to us that so many good men have been gripped by the idea of a sales tax, especially a turnover tax, when on a careful analysis such a tax would be very unequal in its application and prove in years just as burdensome and uneconomic as the excess-profits tax."

It is perhaps significant that neither Mr. Houston, Secretary of the Treasury under the Wilson administration, nor Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the Harding administration, are willing to recommend a sales tax. Dr. Thomas Sewall Adams, adviser of the Treasury Department of both administrations, has the following to say on the sales tax:

Our organization, the Committee of Manufacturers and Merchants on Federal Taxation (Inc.), with headquarters at 1346 Altgeld Street, Chicago, which speaks for 30,000 manufacturers, jobbers, and merchants and nearly 150 commercial organizations, have gone on record against the sales tax in the following language:

"What business men might seemingly gain in lower taxes under this plan they would much more than lose, not only in increased strikes and labor disturbances but in smaller profits due to the decreased trade that would follow. This is not mere theory; it is a historic fact. Any tax that will raise the price to the consumer is bound to cut down sales. Any tax that will increase the cost of living and reduce the purchasing power of the buyer is certain to restrict demand, curtail commercial activity, and slow down production generally. As this is written, word comes from Canada that the Government has now lifted the tax on numerous luxuries because the higher prices, resulting from the imposition of the tax, has practically cut off all demand and forced many luxury-making industries to the wall. Such has been the experience in all countries and in all times. It was the stagnation of business caused by a sales tax rigidly enforced that brought Spain in the Middle Ages from the pinnacle of prosperity to the depths of poverty, just as it was the stagnation of business, due to the heavy sales tax imposed in the Netherlands by the Duke of Alva that reduced that sturdy little nation to a howling wilderness.

"No matter how or when or where a tax on industry be levied, the effect is always to injure industry. Tax sales and you cut down the number of sales; tax imports and you shut out imports; tax manufactures and you check manufacturing; tax improvements and you lessen improvement; tax commerce and you prevent exchange; tax business and you drive it away."

* * * * * * *

So far as known every farmers' organization, including the Farm Bureau Federation, has gone on record against a sales tax. Organized labor is taking the same position, as it might naturally be expected it would. With fully 80 per cent of the population of the country as represented by labor and by farmers opposed to the sales tax, and with business men sharply divided as to their attitude, it is not to be expected that Congressmen will be sympathetically inclined toward a sales tax.

Senator SMOOT. If Mr. Samuel Gompers come out for a sales tax you would favor it, would you not?

Mr. LIGGETT. I beg your pardon?

Senator SMOOT. If Mr. Samuel Gompers announced his approval of a sales tax, you would be for it?

Mr. LIGGETT. No, sir; certainly not. We have nothing to do with the opinion of Mr. Samuel Gompers.

Senator SMOOT. If the Grangers were in favor of it, would you be in favor of it?

Mr. LIGGETT. Senator, I personally do not change my views upon such flimsy pretexts. I am now speaking for the association of merchants and manufacturers——

Senator SMOOT. You are calling attention to these parties being opposed to it; but if they should change their opinion, that would not change your mind at all?

Mr. LIGGETT. Not at all, Senator. You are stating a hypothetical case, and I am stating facts.

Senator SMOOT. We will see about that before a month is over.

Mr. LIGGETT. All right. Thank you.

ORGANIZED LABOR OPPOSED TO A SALES TAX—EDWARD F. M'GRADY, WASHINGTON, D. C., REPRESENTING AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Senator WATSON. Mr. McGrady, will you kindly state your full name, your residence, and whom you represent?

Mr. MCGRADY. My name is Edward F. McGrady; my residence, Washington, D. C.; I am representing the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, Mr. Gompers was extremely anxious to appear before your committee to-day, but at the last minute he was called into a conference of national scope which will mean a great deal to labor in this country, and he felt that he had to be there. * * *

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor, which has just concluded a conference at Cincinnati, adopted a strong protest against the sales tax. This will be submitted to the American Federation of Labor convention which meets in Denver in June.

In addition to this protest of the executive council, we have received in our office thousands of letters of protest from labor unions from every section of the country. The American Federation of Labor, therefore, is appealing to you in behalf of the American worker.

Five millions of the now idle workers and many other millions whose wages have been reduced from 25 to 60 per cent are now going to be called upon to assume that burden in the form of a sales tax. Big business, not satisfied in reducing the standards of living of the wage earners, is now attempting to shift the burden of war and the cost of government from its own shoulders to the backs of the working men and women of the country.

The American worker to-day is toiling for a living wage. A living wage is nothing more than a horse gets—enough to eat and a place to sleep. This proposal would be a tax upon his entire inadequate income, whereas the wealthy would pay out of their excess profits.

Again, there are many of the well-to-do who have very small or no families to support, while the poor people with large families, of three to six or more children, would be taxed for each and every mouth in their household. The more children in a family the larger the tax.

To be sure, the automobile dealer, the fur dealer, the diamond dealer, and other dealers in the luxuries of life want their taxes reduced, and in doing so they are willing to place extra taxes upon the necessities of life, such as food, fuel, clothing, etc.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn, in a report to the National Industrial Tax Conference, declared:

"Taxing a poor man's breakfast table is a formidable slogan to run up against."

But the sales tax is not only taxing the breakfast table, but his supper table and his dinner pail. The "full dinner pail" has elected many men to public office, but what will happen to the men or party who place a tax extraordinary upon a "half-filled dinner pail"?

Senator SIMMONS. You are satisfied that that paper you read reflects the sentiments of Mr. Gompers?

Mr. MCGRADY. I state that positively; that that paper reflects Mr. Gompers's sentiments and those of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

Senator DILLINGHAM. Does it also represent their understanding of the provisions of the bill that is under consideration?

Mr. MCGRADY. I should say so.

Senator SIMMONS. It has been said here that if we do not impose a sales tax under the system of taxation that will probably have to be adopted, the consumer would have to pay a heavier tax than if we impose the sales tax. What is your view about that?

Mr. MCGRADY. I do not believe that is so, Senator. It seems rather peculiar to me that if the big business men of this country are trying to get rid of the excess-profits tax, and, as has been said, if this sales tax is put into effect, the consumer will only be taxed one-third of what he is paying now, we would like to know who is going to pay the rest. If a sales tax is adopted and it is only going to cost the consumer one-third of what he is paying now and the big business men are going to get rid of a lot of taxes that they want to get rid of, where is this money going to come from? Somebody has to pay it.

The extracts from Senate hearings have been offered in order that a general understanding may be had of the character of protest against a sales tax which is voiced emphatically by the farmers and organized laborers of the country through their national organizations. Opinions of experts heretofore quoted have not been repeated, and arguments where cumulative have not been referred to, but one more witness whose testimony takes 30 printed pages of the hearings is too important to omit. Probably no authority on taxation in this country or any other is more highly respected than Dr. Edwin R. A. Seligman, professor of political economy, Columbia University. His writings are accepted as unprejudiced and thorough expositions of tax problems, and his time was unlimited before the committee. His statement of experiments and failure of various forms of sales tax was so comprehensive that without reference to other authorities already quoted Dr. Seligman's statement is a well rounded and complete answer to arguments favoring a consumption tax. I quote briefly as follows (p. 457):

SALES TAX OPPOSED BY HIGHEST AUTHORITY.

Prof. SELIGMAN. I am here, Mr. Chairman, at the invitation of several of the Senators, including Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. MCLEAN, who have asked me to say something about the sales tax and kindred matters. I am especially sorry that Senator MCLEAN is not here to-day. He wanted to hear something about the incidence of the sales tax as compared to that of the excess-profits tax.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Will you take up first, Prof. Seligman, the sales tax and go to the other matters in order?

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed in your own way, Professor, to state your views on the sales tax, and after that on any other phases of the revenue revision that you desire to discuss.

Prof. SELIGMAN. Thank you, sir. So far as the history of the sales tax is concerned, there is a great misconception about that in this country. There have been many examples of taxes on the sale of particular commodities; but, with few exceptions, there have been only sporadic efforts made in any country or at any time to levy a tax on all sales in general; and whenever a general tax on sales has been attempted it has met with resistance and consequently with little success. * * *

I said that the objections to the sales tax, in my opinion, were in part administrative and in part fiscal. I now want to add that the tax also sins against the cardinal principle of equality of taxation.

I do not object to all taxes on consumption, for I believe that every well-balanced system of taxation should include indirect as well as direct taxes. But there is consumption and consumption. There are articles of luxurious consumption; there are articles of convenient consumption; there are articles of necessary consumption. Most of the sales taxes, with a few exceptions, that we have in this country to-day and which are found in other Anglo-Saxon countries as well, are taxes on the sale—and sometimes the production—of articles of luxurious consumption or of the widespread consumption of what can not be called really necessaries. Take, as examples, tobacco and whisky before the present dispensation, because they partake partly of wide use, and yet partly of a system of consumption which perhaps it is desirable to diminish. But when you come to a general sales tax you are dealing with a tax on necessaries, inasmuch as the great mass of sales are sales of necessaries. Naturally so, since the great majority of the people are in modest circumstances; the great mass of commodities sold consists of articles used by the people in modest circumstances. Therefore, as the French writers in the Middle Ages pointed out, general sales tax is a sort of upside-down income tax. Instead of taxing the man with a higher income a little more, or much more, as we do, you tax the man with the smaller income not only relatively as much, but relatively more. It is this instinctive reaction of the common man to the proposal of a sales tax which is responsible for the opposition to it manifested from the time of the Romans under Tiberius all the way through the Middle Ages, when the riots took place, down to modern times, as in this very country, where the laboring classes are now up in arms against it.

* * * * * * *

Senator SIMMONS. Prof. Seligman, nearly all the witnesses in advocacy of the repeal of the excess-profits tax who have been examined here have declared that that part of the income which would have to be paid as taxes was carried to overhead and passed on to the consumer, and in that way became indirect and a consumption tax.

Prof. SELIGMAN. I do not agree with that, Senator.

Senator SIMMONS. You have not classified it as a consumption tax?

Prof. SELIGMAN. No, sir.

But while a tax on particular profits can be shifted to the consumer, a general tax on all profits can not be shifted under normal conditions. Profits are a result of price and not a condition of price. What I mean is that at any given time in an ordinary industry there are all sorts of costs. Some producers make immense profits; some less fortunate individuals make less profits, and some do not make any at all.

* * * * * * *

I should say that I do not think we ought to go any further than stamps, tobacco, and gasoline, because as soon as you do go further you are in danger of trenching upon necessities.

There is a question in my mind, sir, as to sugar. In England they tax sugar, even with their desire not to burden the poor man. So far as sugar may be considered a convenience rather than a necessity, it partakes of the characteristics of these concentrated commodities: a very small tax on sugar would bring in a revenue of a hundred and fifty or two hundred millions. I am a little doubtful about it, however, because in this country the average man has become so accustomed to use sugar that it may almost be considered a necessary.

ON INHERITANCE TAXES.

In England they get far more revenue from their "death duties" with half as much wealth as we possess. If we were to have the rates that are applied in England, not to speak of those that are found in Italy or France or Germany, we could easily get another $100,000,000 or $200,000,000. We could then divide and apportion the yield, say, fifty or more millions among the States, and could thus avoid this intolerable double taxation.

Senator WATSON. You mean by that that the States are to refrain from taxing inheritances altogether, the whole tax to be a Federal tax and a portion of it distributed among the States?

Prof. SELIGMAN. Yes, sir. We can take a leaf out of the book of German experience. I think we can learn something there—although of late it has been a popular belief that nothing good can come from Germany. The fiscal strain has been so great there that they have devised all sorts of new methods. One of the interesting things they have done very recently has been to nationalize the inheritance tax and to provide that a part should go to the separate States in accordance with definite provisions to avoid double taxation.

* * * * * * *

Senator LA FOLLETTE. How would you apportion it among the States?

Prof. SELIGMAN. That brings up a very interesting problem, Senator. I should apportion it as nearly as possible in accordance with what I should call relative economic interests—that is to say, if a man dies and a portion of his estate tax is distributed by the Federal Government, the tax ought to go in part to the State where the real property is situated. Furthermore, if the estate consists of railway bonds or stocks, I should say that a part of it ought to go to the State where the railway is situated on which those bonds and stocks are issued——

Dr. Seligman submitted with his testimony a brief, from which is briefly quoted:

FRENCH SALES TAX HAS A DISASTROUS BUSINESS EFFECT—DISAPPOINTING IN ITS RESULTS AND REPEAL CONSIDERED ALMOST CERTAIN—PASSED ON TO CONSUMER—BUYERS STRUCK AND RECEIPTS FELL TO THIRD OF GOVERNMENT ESTIMATES.

[Special cable to the New York Herald. Copyright, 1921, by the New York Herald.]

NEW YORK HERALD BUREAU,
Paris, May 28.

France being one of the two countries which has experimented with a sales tax such as has been under discussion in the United States, the American people might be interested to know the result of the French experience in this connection. The tax has worked badly here, according to both the Government and the man who pays the tax, but how much this is due to the inefficiency of the French tax machinery, which is notorious, is a question.

"The French sales tax has shown itself as exerting a disastrous and paralyzing effect on business generally, and it is only a question of time until it will have to be superseded by a more rational method of raising money, such as an increased levy on salaries and other income."

This statement was made to a correspondent of the New York Herald to-day by Guillaume de Tarde, State counsellor and adviser to Lucian Dior, minister of commerce. M. de Tarde is considered one of the best tax experts in France.

* * * * * * *

We have therefore only two alternatives—to raise the needed half billion by a tax on wealth or by a tax on consumption. A tax on wealth would mean some modification of the corporation tax; a tax on consumption implies the sales tax. The important point to be remembered here is that we are not comparing the sales tax with the tax on excess profits. The problem is to find a substitute for the excess-profits tax; the comparison must be between the suggested substitutes; not between the original and a particular substitute. For everyone will concede that either substitute is preferable to the original. It is accordingly not a question as between the sales tax and the excess-profits tax, but between the sales tax and the additional tax on corporate profits.

THE SALES TAX.

When this comparison is made, it is clear that both the administrative and the equitable considerations tell against the sales tax. Without repeating here the arguments that have been frequently advanced as to what is precisely meant by a sales tax (for the term covers a multitude of sins), there can be little question but that on purely administrative grounds the extension of the present corporate income tax from 10 to about 15 per cent is a far simpler proposition than to create the entirely new administrative machinery which would be needed to deal with all the complexities of the proposed sales tax. But on the second count, that of equality, the conclusion must be similar. Without entering upon the disputed question of what actually occurred in the excess-profits tax, it is scarcely open to doubt that a flat tax on corporate profits is not susceptible of being shifted in the same sense that a tax on sales can be shifted. The incidence of the profits tax is on wealth, that of the sales tax is on consumption.

THE PRESENT BALANCE.

Under our present system, as we have seen, well-nigh three-quarters of the Federal tax revenue comes from wealth and a little more than one-quarter from consumption. Under the new proposed dispensation of the sales tax, the only taxes on wealth will be the income tax, yielding about one thousand nine hundred millions, and the estate tax of about one hundred thirty millions, or a total of about two billions. That is to say, even if the expenditures can be held down to the contemplated figures, about one-half of the entire Federal tax burden will fall upon consumption; and in the not improbable event that the expenditures will go above the estimated figures, the burden on consumption will be still greater.

THE TAX ON CONSUMPTION.

It is unnecessary here to repeat the arguments why in democratic countries like Great Britain and the United States it has always been the endeavor to burden wealth rather than consumption except when, as in the case of our tariff, the tax on consumption is supposed to react favorably on the national dividend by increasing production, for not only is it undesirable in times of peace to check consumption, which is the very cornerstone of all economic progress, but it is also true that in a community where the mass of the people must consume all their income, whereas the wealthier classes consume a continually diminishing proportion of theirs, a tax on consumption is an inverted or upside-down graduated tax on wealth. The sales tax is for this reason an anti-democratic measure. It has always been an outstanding feature of the less democratic Latin-American civilizations as over against the Anglo-Saxon Commonwealths. It is characteristic to-day of France, of Mexico, and of some of the South American Republics, as it was characteristic in the Middle Ages of entirely undemocratic countries.

POLITICAL COWARDICE AND PUBLIC CONSCIENCE.

Prosperous financiers, heavy editorial writers, and big business generally charge Congress with political cowardice because of its refusal to pass a consumption tax. These interests assume lack of courage exists with Congress because, under present tax laws and other legislation, we have permitted the number of millionaires to become doubled in five years and fabulous fortunes to spring up like mushrooms under law and lax enforcement of restrictions against profiteering and monopolies. Failure or cowardice in refusing to curb such private power and profits, however interpreted, may seem to warrant like conclusions as to a consumption tax. The rapidity with which Congress repealed taxes upon wealth may also afford basis for a belief that Congress is not always moved by motives of universal public good.

The advocates of a consumption tax substitute abuse for reason and transparently false reasoning for logic. For illustration, without confessing they are openly seeking to shift their tax burdens they declare magnificently that every man, woman, and child must contribute toward the Government's support by paying taxes in order to properly love their Government and appreciate its manifold blessings. Assuming that city, school, county, State, and national taxes are not paid in some degree by practically every man and woman in the country, we are assured by those who advocate a consumption tax and have patriotism and love of country instilled into their beings in proportion to the surtaxes they pay that they do not seek to shift their surplus patriotism by shifting their present tax burdens onto the under fellow now asking only for a living wage in order to exist. His rights to an education for his children and to legal protection in constitutional rights guaranteed him and his family are not denied but in some unaccountable way he is expected to enjoy his country more if he pays a sales tax.

In what manner this man's respect for his country, its laws, or its institutions is to be promoted by a consumption tax placed on every member of his family in violation of long-established principles of taxation, no man assumes to explain. Again, these shrewd financiers, brilliant high-salaried writers, and other congressional critics in advocating a consumption tax excuse its imposition by claiming an average excess profit of 23 per cent has been collected by the profiteers in the past as a protection from the excess-profits tax, whereas not even omnipotence could ascertain any average in the carnival of profiteering that exists in some lines of business, even of this new year.

Again, these critics who assail Congress from their elevated perch justify a consumption tax because "the consumer always pays the tax anyway," but he ought to be taxed more "in order that he may feel he is supporting his country and may love it proportionately" through "the consumption tax which he does not know he is paying."

AN HONEST HEAD TAX.

Leaving for the moment a method of reasoning that supplies in propaganda and violence what it lacks in logic, let us in like manner test the courage and honesty of consumption tax advocates by their own measure.

A consumption tax is levied on the necessaries of life consumed by every man, woman, and child without ability to pay. All pay alike for the same articles consumed, from the wealthiest to the blind beggar, all meet on a common level, depending on the number of mouths to feed and bodies to clothe. A consumption tax is paid through increased prices, ordinarily far beyond the actual tax, due to pyramiding of profits depending in amount upon the shrinking conscience of the different salesmen. These additional profits are placed by Canadian witnesses quoted at sometimes ten times the actual tax paid.

Conceding that a consumption tax places a burden on the consumer because of increased profits in addition to the tax charged all along the line by the manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, and, above all, the retailer, why not eliminate all these middlemen's added profits borne by the consumer under a consumption tax? Let us be frank and honest with ourselves and remove any charge of cowardice which may be lodged against Congress by those whom we represent.

A consumption tax like that of Canada is estimated to raise $500,000,000 annually here, although such estimates are rarely realized. On that tax the consumers will probably pay from one billion to two billion dollars increased profits represented by higher prices tacked onto existing prices which will be paid by the consumer because "he does not know it."

Let us squarely tax him only a half billion dollars and collect it openly, thus saving to him all the additional billion dollars or more in added wasted profits that otherwise would go to the manufacturer, middlemen, and retailers. In Canada the average consumption tax paid by a man with a wife and three children based on tax collections is found to be $31.10 annually under prior tax laws, which I believe have since been increased in rate. On the same basis a man and wife with six children pays $49.76 annually; and a constituent of mine with 17 living children at the same rate would pay $118.18 annually to the Government through the Canadian consumption tax rate on the average.

A CONSUMPTION TAX IS SECRETIVE AND DECEIVES THE TAXPAYER.

If through additional profits and pyramiding double the amount is charged and paid by the consumer, the added cost of living to the man with three children is $62.20 annually and to the man with a wife and six children $99.52 annually. Advices from Canada that the increased price is sometimes ten times the tax is also borne out by the testimony of Senator Hardwick before our committee that ten times the soft-drink tax had been added and collected in this country, but I am adding only a modest increase of twice the amount of tax which can be estimated at the higher rates, with a certainty that the tax will be paid always with increased profits by the consumer "who does not know he is paying it."

It appears that any consumption tax tends to increase prices far beyond the actual tax before it reaches the consumer, so let us meet the issue squarely, and have the exact tax paid by the consumer without concealment or subterfuge. Congress could compel him to pay a poll tax of $5 for himself and for every member of his family, which tax will be ascertained, and can be paid with more certainty of collection than any consumption tax and that would realize about the same amount of tax.

Under this arrangement Mr. Otto Kahn, Julius Bache, Rothschild, and Goldsmith, tax advocates whom I discussed in a prior speech—January 21, 1921—would each pay $5 in lieu of their present income taxes, and the same rate of taxes would be paid by Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Morgan, and others of large wealth. True, the average farmer with a wife and three children now working 14 hours a day and receiving $465 annual income for his labor, according to the Anderson commission, would feel the injustice of such tax reaching $25 annually, or $5 per head for every member of his family, but that would be far preferable than to pay $50 or possibly $100 in higher prices through a consumption tax in order to raise the $25 paid to the Government by the manufacturer, jobber, and wholesaler.

It is doubtful if many Members would be returned as Representatives after the enactment of such tax, and the tax would probably be repealed at the first session following the first election thereafter, because the consumers of the country "would know they were then paying the tax." As one who believes in the principle of taxing according to ability to pay, I am opposed to either the head tax or consumption tax, but we should honestly face the issue that is clothed in false colors through a consumption tax, and be free from any charge of cowardice or in palming off on the people a gold-brick tax.

The protest against a consumption tax caused Congress to repeal the nuisance and luxury taxes, which were limited sales taxes collected from those best able to pay, not on necessaries of life. Knowledge of the tax levied and collected was assigned to be a cause for repeal. If that action by Congress was just to the 98 per cent, what will be our excuse for levying a secret tax that is pyramided on the cost of the necessities of life?

THE CANADIAN SALES TAX.

I have heretofore quoted Maj. Hobart, of Montreal, a sales tax official who takes pride in the Canadian sales tax irrespective of the injustice of its imposition, because it raises revenue and as he frankly puts it—

Of course, the consumer pays the tax eventually, but he does not know it.

Of course, the consumer does know that he pays high prices for goods bought, and I am informed that whereas prior to the war Canadian prices were uniformly below those in this country, frequently far below, that now under the consumption tax which is added, pyramided and profits without limit charged, that prices are higher than in this country. I do not state this comparison as a fact, although my authority is a Member of the House who made a recent trip of several days to Canada in order to get the opinion of officials who generally seemed satisfied with the law and its workings.

If I remember correctly, this was before the recent election in Canada when a considerable revolution in politics in the neighboring country was attributed to high prices. Be that as it may, I have reason to believe all are not satisfied with the Canadian sales tax, although they pay the tax and "do not know it."

The proponents of a sales tax point to this sales tax which conceals from the consumer the additional profits, and they say that no opposition is offered to such tax in Canada. Tax officials who are anxious to collect in all they can raise find the tax satisfactory because people have to consume in order to live, and so they are sure to pay taxes because they can not avoid consuming. But the consumer, even though secretly taxed to an unknown degree by added prices, is the one who bears the burden.

From a number of letters, I submit the following that indicates what the consumer thinks of the Canadian tax:

ST. JOHNS TRADE AND LABOR COUNCIL,
St. Johns, N. B., December 12, 1921.

* * * Yours of the 3d received inquiring about the sales tax in force in Canada. * * * Briefly, the way the tax works is that each time an article is turned over or sold this tax is collected, and in these days of manufacturers, jobbers, wholesalers, retailers, and other middlemen it is easily seen where the tax lands us by the time the article reaches the consumer, for each time the article is sold the tax is collected and, of course, added to the next selling price, and a small tax of 1 or 1½ per cent easily amounts up to possibly 10 per cent or more in some cases.

Fraternally, yours,

GEO. R. MELVIN, Secretary.

A SEVERE TAX ON THE WAGE EARNER.

HAMILTON DISTRICT TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,
Hamilton, Ontario, December 26, 1921.

* * * Re sales tax in Canada and its effects upon the wage earners; can only say that this tax falls with peculiar severity upon the wage earner. It is very much like a tariff, minus the protective benefits. It is passed on to the consumer in every instance. And as the working classes on a whole are the greatest consumers, they of necessity pay the greater share of the tax.

This, however, is in strict accord with true capitalistic economics and administration. They are sternly opposed to all forms of direct taxation, which would mean that those who own approximately 85 per cent of the wealth of the country would pay their just share of the taxes. This, of course, would never do. Hence the sales tax. Trusting that this information is answering your query,

I am,

Yours, fraternally,

[SEAL.] H. G. FOSTER, General Secretary.

Again I quote from another letter:

TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,
Toronto, December 13, 1921.

This tax was imposed to supersede the surplus profits tax which was in operation during the later stages of the war.

While organized wage earners have not given any official expression regarding the sales tax, the general discussions on the political situation during the last few weeks leave no doubt as to their opinion. This system of taxation was soundly condemned by every speaker in any way connected with the labor movement, officially or otherwise.

My information leads me to believe that the tax is imposed on the manufacturers' output, the increased cost being passed on to the dealers and eventually the consumers pay the tax in increased prices. Unlike the income tax and business tax which recognize more or less the principle of "ability to pay," the sales tax applies to consumers in the purchase of commodities, and if the consumer can not pay the increased price by reason of the tax, he goes without the goods. This sales tax largely applies to the necessaries of life, hence you will readily understand why organized workers oppose such methods of taxation when surplus profits are untouched. I am further of the opinion that the great majority of our people are unaware of what this sales tax really means. They pay the increased price without knowledge of the amount, no mention being made concerning the tax. To put the whole matter shortly—legally flim-flammed.

Yours, truly,

TORONTO DISTRICT LABOR COUNCIL,
JAMES WATT, Secretary.

"Legal flimflamming" is a name with which to entitle the proposed sales tax here. If its passage results in a political turnover like that experienced by Canada a few weeks ago, it will evidence a well-grounded, universal prejudice against flim-flam games.

LEGAL FLIMFLAMMING.

One other brief statement I quote from a communication dated Ottawa, December 2, that is more of a résumé of the tax than is covered by other correspondence. It says:

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, December 2.

Ottawa this week received, entertained, and introduced to the intricacies of its sales tax act a party comprising 47 Members of Congress, representing 30 different States, railway men, newspaper men, and others. They came as the guest of Mr. William Randolph Hearst, with Hon. LESTER D. VOLK, of New York, as head. * * * But while the members of the party studied the sales tax act from a variety of angles, your correspondent ventures the assertion that they did not receive nor consider facts with reference to its application to the consumer.

I do not believe that in their examination of Government statistics they found that a man with a wife and one child in Canada pays $18.66 every year as a result of this form of taxation; that a man with a wife and two children pays $24.88; that families of varying sizes pay on the following basis:

Man, wife, and three children	$31.10
Man, wife, and four children	37.32
Man, wife, and five children	43.54
Man, wife, and six children	49.76
Man, wife, and seven children	55.98
Man, wife, and eight children	62.20

In other words, the sales tax in Canada adds to the living expenses of a family of 10 $5 a month. Families of this size may be "unfashionable," but those who are not particularly stylish feel it to the extent as it applies, as illustrated above. Bachelors are lucky!

These figures are based upon official statements. Sales-tax collections for the 12 months ended October last amounted to $52,870,000, while our population is approximately 8,500,000. This means a per capita tax of $6.22 for every man, woman, and child in Canada yearly.

The following table strikingly illustrates what income and sales tax combined mean to a Canadian, as compared with a citizen of the United States:

Canada.
Income—man, wife, and two children	$2,500.00
Income tax	4.00
Sales tax	24.88
Total	28.88
United States.
Income—man, wife, and two children	2,500.00
Income tax	8.00
Total	8.00

The sales tax in Canada is, above all else, a tax on consumers. The more you buy the more you pay. It is paid, in the majority of cases, not on one able to pay but in proportion as one must buy things. With a person of means it is entirely optional whether he buy expensive furniture, limousine, etc., but in buying articles of ordinary consumption the average person has no choice. We must buy to live, to exist, and as we buy we pay.

The sales tax increases the cost of living. There can be no doubt about it. In Canada it is not a tax on luxuries, it is a tax on everything; and we must have necessities before we have luxuries.

CANADIAN TAX AND THE FARMER.

In this country it can be safely said that organized labor and organized agricultural societies are overwhelmingly opposed to a sales tax, as I have shown by reputable witnesses. In Canada the organizations are not so closely formed, but from the foregoing it may well be deduced that labor in Canada is against a sales tax. It could not be otherwise. Agricultural interests in Canada are not for a sales tax.

The Winnipeg Grain Growers' Guide put it that a sales tax—is immensely pleasing to those who had to pay the excess-profits and income tax and who care little where the burden of taxation falls as long as it doesn't fall on them.

It says:

The people want justice in taxation before convenience, and there is precious little justice in this proposed tax on sales.

Admitting that the sales tax is finding great favor with financial interests across the border, it adds:

To those who are not unacquainted with the ways of financial interests, the mere fact that the proposition emanates from their councils is enough to provoke suspicion, and when it is affirmed that the tax is "passed along in small fractions and is finally paid by the consumer, practically without his knowledge, and the additions are so trifling as not materially to affect prices," that such a tax would raise more revenue than the country actually needs, and that its adoption would lead to repeal of the excess-profits tax and the income tax, one begins to detect the "nigger in the woodpile." It takes a wizard of finance to maintain that some $500,000,000 a year can be painlessly extracted from the people of Canada.

The railways tried to work such a proposition, the Grain Growers' Guide continues, in connection with the increase in freight rates, but "nobody believed them," nor will anybody "accept this idea of a painless system of taxation," and we read:

The tax, it is said, will be passed on to the consumer. A farmer takes a load of wheat to an elevator and sells it. He must pay a tax of 1 per cent on the sale. Every time the wheat changes hands it pays a tax of 1 per cent, so that when it reaches the ultimate consumer the tax is really about 6 per cent. The bulk of the wheat raised in this country is exported; that is, the ultimate consumer resides in a foreign country. Do the advocates of this tax really and seriously contend that we can make the foreigner pay the tax? They know quite well that such a tax could not be passed on, and that when the farmer paid the first 1 per cent he paid it by deducting it from the price he received for the wheat. He could not pass on the tax; it would be paid by him and by no one else.

THE CANADIAN TAX SHIFTS WAR TAXES FROM "WELL-TO-DO TO THE MASS OF THE PEOPLE."

In a news article dated June 27, 1921, a writer has the following to say under the caption "Canadian farmers fight the sales tax":

The agrarian group in the Canadian Parliament, which represents both the organized farmers and labor, and which has a very large following throughout the country, is opposed to the sales tax as it is now being levied in Canada. Owing to the fact that the very heavy war expenditure had rendered it necessary to impose heavy taxation, there was a strong disposition on the part of all classes to give this method of taxation a fair trial, for it was felt that all should bear a fair share of the burden. But in its latest application, the tax, instead of spreading taxation over all classes in proportion to their ability to pay, is now being made the means whereby the war taxes are being shifted from the backs of the well-to-do to the backs of the mass of the people.

Being, for the most part, strong supporters of the principle of direct, as opposed to indirect, taxation, there was also a disposition on the part of the leaders of the farmer group to give the sales tax a fair trial on the ground that the collections would go directly to the Government; but last year's tax of 1 per cent has this year been increased so that in the aggregate it undoubtedly amounts to more like a straight tax of 2 per cent. For in addition to a 50 per cent increase on general sales, there has been introduced a tax of 1 per cent additional on imports, so that the sales tax has really been used as a lever to raise the tariff.

To some of the best informed of the agricultural leaders the sales tax never did look good, for it was manifestly a consumption tax, and this tax always weighs most heavily upon the great mass of the people. They contended that it would place an additional obstacle in the way of trade at a time when every effort should be made to remove such obstacles. Besides, it looked too much like an attempt to place taxation on the wrong spot. The very quarter from which the sales tax proposals came made them suspicious.

PUTS BURDEN ON LEAST ABLE TO PAY.

These views have been more than confirmed by the experience of the past year. To-day the Canadian sales tax stands clearly revealed as an attempt to lift the burden from the backs of the wealthy and to place it on those who are not nearly as able to pay. Besides, not satisfied with a 1 per cent measure, which advocates of the tax generally have insisted would be more than sufficient to raise the large revenues required, an almost double dose has now been administered.

Canada's experience with this tax has shown beyond all shadow of a doubt that even as a revenue producer it is a much overrated measure. During the 11 months up to April 30 that it has been in operation, it produced $40,000,000 in revenue, but during the last six months of this time the collections fell from a little over $5,000,000 a month to less than $2,900,000. Indeed, at the time that the changes were made in the tax it was only bringing in about $2,500,000 a month. One can just imagine how far that would go toward meeting an expenditure of nearly $600,000,000 a year in Canada.

The failure of this tax as a revenue producer is a feature that concerns the financier, the business man, the farmer, and laborer. It is absolutely necessary that any measure of taxation adopted should bring in the money. If it does not do this, then, even if it has other features that would recommend it, it should be ruled out.

Calling attention to what are claimed to be erroneous statements of Jules Bache, of New York, a sales tax exponent, this writer, W. G. Cates, says:

It would be well for the American public to understand that nothing like this has happened in Canada. When the sales tax was introduced last year not only was the income tax not reduced but the exemptions on it were not extended. On the contrary, the tax on incomes of $5,000 was somewhat increased. This year, when the tax was very considerably increased, there was not the slightest change made in the income tax. If the claims made respecting this tax were valid, then what has been promised by its advocates in the United States should have taken place in Canada. It has worked out that the average Canadian not only pays all the income taxes he ever did but a new tax, that on sales.

On the subject of higher prices and other objectionable features of the Canadian tax this writer says:

It is being found out in Canada that the sales tax is open to grave objection on the ground that it increases the cost of living in that it retards the downward movement of the prices of manufactured articles, which have not fallen as much as have those of other products. It is true that in Canada the products that the farmer sells himself are not taxed, but the articles he has to buy are, and in some cases this is becoming a very serious matter. The consumer may well beware of the carefully worked out examples showing that the sales tax will never increase the cost of an article by more than 3½ per cent. This may be true in so far as the wholesale trade is concerned, but it is far from being true of the retail trade. What ordinary storekeeper figures out to the tenth part of a cent a 1 or a 2 per cent tax on an article, or what his profit on it should be? It invariably follows that the consumer not only pays the tax but a little more.

As a general observation, let the consumer beware of the sales tax. It will not do him any good, nor is it intended by those who advocate it that it should. If the consumer did not pay, there would be little heard of it in quarters where it is most strongly advocated. This is well known in Canada.

The one thing to be most feared about the sales tax is that it will not stop at 1 per cent. Canada has demonstrated this beyond a shadow of doubt. Last year it was a tax of 1 per cent on the sales of manufacturers and producers to the wholesalers and jobbers, or 2 per cent if the sale was made direct to the retailer. This year the tax in the first case has been increased to 1½ per cent, and to 3 per cent in the other. But this is not all. On top of this is another tax of 1 per cent on imports, so that in the case of sales of domestic goods the consumer pays at least 3 per cent, which is increased by 1½ per cent every time the article changes hands, while the consumer pays at least 4 per cent on imported goods. In the matter of automobile tires, the materials for which are imported, it is quite probable that the purchaser will pay at least 8 per cent more.

The imposition of a 1 per cent tax on imports will also increase the price of most home-produced articles to this extent. That is to say, those who produce or sell them will take advantage of the increase in the tariff to raise their own prices. This means another charge on the consumer.

Last year in Canada there was quite a long list of articles on which the sales tax was not collected. There is still an exemption list, but it is not nearly as long as it was. Last year tea and coffee were not taxed; this year they are, and being imported the tax is at least 4 per cent to the consumer. Canned goods were not taxed last year; this year they are, and so one might go on down the list. All this makes the cost of living higher. Take lumber. It was originally proposed to collect the same tax on it that other products bear, but when it was pointed out that a 3 per cent tax on domestic lumber would mean quite an extra increase in the cost of building, and that a 4 per cent tax would mean a great deal more, it was decided to fix the tax at 2 and 3 per cent, respectively.

SALES TAX RECEIPTS DECREASED TO 43 PER CENT OF ESTIMATES.

From another source an unbiased opinion is offered as to the returns from the Canadian sales tax:

[Special correspondence of the Annalist.]

OTTAWA, June 4, 1921.

A study of Canadian war-taxation methods is of interest to Americans chiefly because of Canada's one year of experience with the sales tax. Like the United States, Canada has had her business profits tax, her heavy personal and corporation income taxes with their surtaxes, also heavy excise taxes on liquors and tobacco, as well as a tax on certain features of transportation. She has a tax on checks and bills of exchange and promissory notes which is still retained and seems likely to be for some time. As the receipts from the latter are lumped with the postal revenue, it is impossible to say what they total in a year, but the amount is evidently worth while, and has the additional advantage in that it involves no hardship. As in the United Kingdom, the business profits tax has been abolished, though collections will continue during the current fiscal year. The last of the luxury taxes have also been withdrawn.

Until the last fiscal year the income tax was somewhat of a disappointment, the total receipts during the three years to the end of March, 1921, not having been more than $75,000,000, of which $46,000,000 is credited to 1920–21. The business profits tax up to March 31 brought in $150,000,000. Canada's experience with the luxury taxes is not considered very fortunate, their collection having been attended with strenuous and very general protests. As a revenue producer, however, they were more fruitful than any other of the new taxes, for during the six months they were in operation the collections totaled $42,000,000, which, at the rate of $7,000,000 a month, made them second only to customs as a source of revenue.

The sales tax, which was introduced during the early part of June, 1920, produced $40,898,383 up to April 30, or at the rate of $3,718,034 a month, the April collections having been $2,875,219. At the old rate the May collections would probably be approximately $2,500,000.

The question naturally arises, Has the sales tax been a success? The answer will depend much on one's point of view. Obviously it produced $40,000,000 within 11 months, and probably by as easy a method as the Government could have devised, so in this respect it may be considered a success. But as a major source of revenue it has not been a success, the best evidence of this being that the Government this year found it necessary to reduce considerably the number of exemptions; to increase by 50 per cent the rate on domestic sales; while in addition to this has been added another 1 per cent on imports.

The tax when introduced, having been entirely new to Canada, it was difficult to estimate the revenue it would bring in during the year, but it was hoped that $60,000,000 might be secured. Naturally it took time to erect and get into smooth running order the collecting machinery, but by August this had been done. The early returns seemed to justify estimates of revenue, for in September the collections were $4,918,576, and in October they went up to $5,020,476. From this high point there was a decline in April of 43 per cent.

EFFECT OF SALES TAX.

The decrease in collections was due chiefly to the decline in prices and to the marked falling off in the purchasing power of the public. In April, as compared with October, there was a decrease of 55 per cent in domestic collections and of 39 per cent in collections on imports. The indications at the beginning of May were that the bottom had not been reached, for in April the collections were $314,000 less than in March, this having been the greatest drop since the beginning of the year. That the collections from imports under the old rate were also far from being at the minimum is further evident from the marked decline in the value of imports during May, which is still going on. These considerations very largely influenced the Government in coming to the decision both to increase the rate and to broaden the basis of the tax.

What effect the sales tax had in reducing sales it is difficult to say. Some months ago one heard much of a buyers' strike, but one is warranted in saying that this was due rather to the prevailing high prices, resulting from general causes, rather than to the effect of the tax in keeping them up. As the fairly heavy luxury taxes imposed last spring were in force until December, it may be taken for granted that these had much more to do with the maintaining of prices than had the sales tax. Only since the 1st of December last has the sales tax been an appreciable factor in determining prices, if at all.

In Canada there has been very little attempt to determine the exact effect of the sales tax in increasing the cost of commodities to the consumer. There is nothing more than estimates to base calculations on, which may not be nearly as exact as one could desire. In this respect those who seek to draw conclusions from the Canadian sales tax as a determinant of prices are badly handicapped.

A DANGEROUS POLITICAL ISSUE.

While ease in collecting is important, it is not the chief consideration in a tax. Except it be considered as a secondary or subsidiary source of revenue, it must produce the money. When collections fall away so rapidly as those from the sales tax have done during the last six months, the results must be considered disappointing. Canada's experience to date would not justify expectations that the sales tax warrants the abandonment of other fruitful and definitely ascertained sources of revenue. What it will produce can not be definitely known until business conditions become normal. Against ease in collecting is to be taken into account the fact that the extent to which the tax is now being collected in Canada is bound to make it an important political issue, and that of an especially dangerous kind just now, when appeals to class consciousness are so effective.

On the whole, Canada's taxation experience generally for the last five years would seem to teach that if national budgets are to be balanced, then assured sources of revenue should be retained rather than abandoned for those that merely look promising. It may be true that public opinion would not have stood for the retention of the luxury taxes, but considered solely from the revenue standpoint, had they been retained it is more than probable that they would have raised 50 to 75 per cent more than the sales tax has. Naturally, a finance minister prefers the eastiest way, but the way becomes harder in proportion as the rate is raised. For Americans possibly the chief lesson of the Canadian sales-tax experiment is that the revenue expected can not be secured from a 1 per cent rate collected solely on commodities with anything like a reasonable exemption list.

Speaking of a turnover sales tax, under consideration in Canada, the Calgary Farm and Ranch Review says:

While fully recognizing the deplorable psychological effect upon industrial production and management caused by the imposition of a drastic measure of direct taxation on such earnings, which must be painfully apparent to every close observer, and while not disposed to discount the estimates quoted above to any serious extent, we can not escape the dismal conclusion that the new proposals, if forthwith translated into legislation, would split on the rock of practical politics, inasmuch as they will certainly fail to appeal to a majority of the voters in Canada at the forthcoming general elections.

The Montreal Witness and Canadian Homesteader says on the same subject:

The tax is unfair, in this that it falls unduly on the poor.

Many business journals and public officials, I am informed, favor the tax, but in view of its failure as a revenue producer, its unjust burden "on the poor," and its political liability, as demonstrated, any party or legislative body adopting such tax, which is repudiated by practically all the authorities quoted, will have due notice of its effect.

CANADA "KNOWS IT PAYS THE TAX"—THE TAX SHIFTERS SHIFTED.

No one thing alone turned the tide of elections in Canada where the Conservatives were swept into the scrap heap a few days ago. No one thing decides any election ordinarily. A culmination of things for which the Conservatives stood caused their overwhelming defeat. A high protective tariff, repeal of an excess-profits tax, just in principle, and enactment of an unjust sales tax were among recent Conservative "accomplishments."

Letters of denunciation and Canadian press items quoted from widely different points in Canada afford their own explanation of causes. Protestants across the border or in this country against a sales tax presumably are as intelligent and of far broader vision and wisdom than any legislative Moses now guided by the Otto Kahns, Baches, Rothschilds, and Goldsmiths who in the first exodus may find a parallel for the extended pilgrimage into an economic and political wilderness that lies before us.

The Canadian election of December 6, 1921, resulted in Liberals, 117; Progressives, 65; Conservatives, 51. Prior to the election the Parliament stood—Conservatives, 120; Liberals, 84; Progressives, 14. A reversal of power from 120 to 98 held by Conservatives to 177 to 65 under the new Liberal-Progressive government should not be lost on the American Congress which has repealed the excess-profits tax and now faces a high protection act and obnoxious sales tax that must all, if passed, be indorsed or repudiated at the 1922 elections.

CANADIAN "MANUFACTURERS' TAX" THE SAME OLD VAMPIRE TAX.

Opinions, briefly quoted, regarding the Canadian sales tax are offered because of recent propaganda for that particular tax, which, like all other consumption taxes, is sought by tax officials whenever the tax can be laid on the consumer and collected from him while "he does not know it."

Every consumption tax is open to the objection that it places the burden on the consumer, least able to pay, and is generally secretive for that reason.

I can not make this any plainer than by quoting a short letter recently received from representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation. In these letters they assume to speak for an agricultural organization numbering between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 active members. They denounce all consumption taxes that in like manner are denounced by Canadian labor and agricultural interests, speaking from the standpoint of the consumer.

I quote:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Chicago, Ill., December 27, 1921.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your letter of December 23. The American Farm Bureau Federation is unalterably opposed to any general sales or turnover tax, a manufacturer's tax, or any means of shifting the bulk of the taxes from income to consumption taxes.

The more the matter is agitated and the better the people come to understand what is involved the more determined they become in their opposition, and this policy, if persisted in, will surely bring calamity to its advocates.

It takes from the farmer, the laborer, and all those below the income-tax level a part of their living, and the bulk of the tax would necessarily come out of the necessaries of life—food, fuel, shelter, and clothing.

It is an effort to shift to the 90,000,000 people below the income-tax level the burden of the war taxes; it would absorb a considerable part of what buying power they now have, and thus sink us still deeper in the slough from which we are trying to extricate ourselves.

It would stir up such a social ferment as we have never had in this country, and is both socially unjust and economically unsound.

It is opposed by all the agricultural interests of the country as well as by organized labor. Political madness lies that way.

Yours, truly,

H. C. MCKENZIE,
Tax Representative.

The following letter from President Howard is equally positive in statement:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Chicago, Ill., December 28, 1921.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FREAR: * * * We believe that taxes should be levied according to the measure of ability of the individual to meet them, and are particularly opposed to the so-called sales tax or turnover tax. Its enactment would place an undue burden upon the farmers of the country, due to the fact that their income both on labor and invested capital is, and always has been, below that of any other class of our people, while at the same time we are of necessity very large consumers not only of food and clothing but of steel and iron products, building materials, etc. The sales tax would add to the costs of all these things, which burden would be strenuously opposed by all farmers. Not only that, such a tax would react on industry by further curtailing the farmers' purchases, and industry is already suffering from that very cause. * * *

Very truly, yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
J. R. HOWARD, President.

WHY A SECRET TAX?

Mr. Chairman, the sales tax is not first added by the retailer but by the manufacturer, wholesaler, and jobber and carried on to the ultimate consumer, who does not know it.

Is it not significant that this method of concealing the sales tax, with possible unlimited profits, is urged by great business interests that struck from the conference report on the revenue bill a Senate amendment making public income returns of large taxpayers? Secrecy and concealment are weapons equally dangerous with which to open the gates to gross injustices, whether in the exaction of a sales tax or enactment of legislation. Those who urge this sales-tax secrecy offer a quack remedy to satisfy the taxpayer. Are they right in their estimate of his intelligence?

History recalls a wonderful campaign made by the boy orator from the Platte, who nearly captured the steering gear of the ship of state over a score of years ago by his cry that a tariff is a tax levied on everything we use from the cradle to the coffin. In a measure he stated an economic truth, but justification for a protective tariff was urged because of employment given labor that would produce at home and would keep out foreign producers; that would bring increased wages and comfort to the laborers and their families, with a full dinner pail, better living conditions, home market, and independence for our people; that, through increased competition, would lower prices.

A sales tax makes no pretense of being levied to furnish employment to labor or to aid home production in order to reduce prices to the consumer through competition, but this tax is to supply need for Federal finances heretofore met by the corporation excess-profits tax and income surtax. A consumption tax on the poor is to supplant a luxury tax on the rich or well-to-do consumer, which is a tax we have just repealed. It taxes all alike on the necessaries consumed.

SMITH, JONES, AND BROWN.

For illustration, a sales tax will give Bill Smith, the farmer, and Tom Jones, the iron molder, or Nancy Holmes, the seamstress, and Joe Brown, who sweeps the streets, the God given privilege of paying the same tax on all they consume that is now paid by Carnegie, Morgan, Kahn, and Rockefeller, with this difference, that Rockefeller may buy shoes and food for himself alone from out his many millions of annual income, whereas Smith, Jones, and Brown will pay a sales tax on everything their wives and all their children consume, in addition to the tax on their homes, while the pay check that has recently been deflated will be smashed again and again with the new tax.

Another view is afforded when Smith, the farmer, carries his produce to town and finds farm products have fallen below 1913 prices, whereas prices charged him by department stores or retailers average from 50 to 100 per cent more than pre-war prices. During the war he carried 5 bushels of corn or a hide to town in exchange for the shoes bought for himself or wife, but now he takes 25 bushels of corn or several hides to town for the same shoes on which the Canadian tax collector says a new additional sales tax will be so levied; the consumer will pay it, but not know it, because in addition to more profits it is added to the present price of the shoes.

Jones and Brown, whose pay checks slumped 10 per cent last month, and who are confronted with another pay cut or a prolonged vacation without pay, are likely to engage in the same process of reasoning that affects Smith when he remembers that his legislative Representative in Washington not only unsoaked the rich, who are best able to pay, but soaked with a sales tax the fellow who is fighting hard to exist.

It makes no difference to them that Otto Kahn in his private car is touring the country in efforts to instruct Congress through his four years' experience of American citizenship, nor are they impressed with the news that the Sun, Comet, Star, or World are in favor of the simplicity catch-em and skin-em tax, or that publishers who enjoy an annual income of six or seven figures are now relieved from the nightmare of an excess-profits tax. Smith, Jones, Holmes, and Brown, of whom many millions under different surnames are to pay new taxes, will know that an additional mortgage has been placed on mere existence and their love for the sales tax and its legislative supporters will be as warm as the Canadian blizzard that proposes to spread its sales tax mantle over our own people.

I have endeavored to address these few remarks to that phase of the tax burden which affects the human side and it should not be forgotten that the Government's interest is primarily concerned in the happiness and comfort of that human. This view of the question presents a responsibility which concerns Congress when we are asked to spread a sales tax on the people of the country.

ALL SALES TAXES ARE CONSUMPTION TAXES.

In an effort to place the scope of a turnover sales tax before the House I made some observations on that proposal in January of this year, and while the two methods of taxation differ in some particulars the manufacturers' tax possesses many of the objectionable elements of a turnover sales tax, and is equally objectionable in its application to all that the consumers eat, drink, wear, and use, irrespective of their ability to pay.

This Congress has repealed many taxes based on ability to pay, and to that extent we have violated a recognized principle of taxation. It now remains for us to put a final stamp on the power of wealth if a sales tax is enacted.

We are Representatives free to act, but it is well to bear in mind that seductive arguments favoring a sales tax come from big business of bipartisan affiliations that wants to be permanently relieved from any fear of future excess-profits tax and escape from income taxes; from department and retail stores that ask to be relieved from any limitation of present profits so as more easily to cover up profits, huge profits, on the plea that the tax is responsible. All these powerful agencies will be engaged in pressing this sales tax on Congress.

Do not let us forget that although powerful Republican and Democratic journals indorse the tax that practically every Democratic Member on this floor is recorded against such tax time after time, and it will be the most potent and persuasive argument in the hands of every opponent throughout the next campaign that Republican Members were found supporting such an indefensible proposition. In the average constituency, a great majority of the people are comparatively poor, and while it is a popular belief that God loves the poor because He made so many of them, they can not depend on that love while Congress is representing them, and it will be for you to answer if, after having voted to repeal over a half billion dollars in annual taxes on wealth as shown by the record of the American Congress, you join in laying an obnoxious consumption tax on the country.

I will close this discussion, which I have offered from the standpoint of a layman, with a brief word of advice from a woman who appeared before the Senate Finance Committee. Remembering the protests from many millions of farmers, railroad men, and organized labor, whose representatives appeared before the Senate committee, it is well to remember that millions of women throughout the country are equally interested and opposed to the passage of any consumption tax. In other words, the 98 per cent of the 26,000,000 voters at the polls last election speak in large degree through those I have quoted, and last but not least forcible is the argument of Mrs. Walter I. Swanton, president of the Woman's Single Tax Club, whose statement appears on page 358 of the hearings:

MRS. WALTER I. SWANTON, PRESIDENT OF THE WOMEN'S SINGLE TAX CLUB.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you desire to speak on, Mrs. Swanton?
Mrs. SWANTON. Opposition to the sales tax, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?
Mrs. SWANTON. I am president of the Women's Single Tax Club.
The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.
Mrs. SWANTON. I would like the committee to let me just make these statements before they begin to ask questions.
The CHAIRMAN. Very well.
Mrs. SWANTON. The proposed sales tax is another consumption tax. We know that all consume about the same amount, the poorer the quality the dearer in the end. Also those living from hand to mouth pay more for what they buy. This means that the poor man pays a heavier tax than the rich man. A family whose cost of living used up the full amount of its income pays a tax upon every cent of the income, while the rich pay a consumption tax upon the portion spent, and the portion saved is exempt. The richer the person, the greater is the exemption. This is true of all consumption taxes; they are unjust and increase poverty.

* * * * * * *

THE PENALTY OF UNDERCONSUMPTION.

The urgency of protecting production at the expense of consumption is putting the cart before the horse. Production does not create prosperity, but consumption does. The present situation is not one of over or under production. I beg permission to cite my own personal experiences. My hat, made over at trifling expense, has done service for five years. I could go through the whole of my household expenses in the same way. This is not an exception; every woman I know can tell a similar story. Women are the purchasers of the country. They are saturated with thrift. High prices have made it necessary. You no doubt think that by such frugal means vast savings have been piled up. That should be the reward of thrift, but it is not so. I have three growing children that must have nourishing food, and what I have saved from the dry-goods merchants has gone into the pockets of the packers. Many less fortunate, having hit bottom long ago, can not save on dry goods, so must save on food to the injury of the family and the sacrifice of the future generation.

Figures showing the underfed people of this country are alarming; five children fainted in school recently from lack of nourishment. This is underconsumption; it is the reason why our warehouses are filled with cotton and wool and our cold-storage plants filled with food. It is a disgrace to the voters of this country. I say voters, because I believe in the truth of the story of the man who came to Washington to find the power of the Government. He came up here on the hill; it was not here. He went to the Executive; it was not there. Some one said Wall Street. He went there, but did not find it. Seriously minded, he went home and looked in the looking glass; there he saw the power of the Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, while we were on the discussion of the Russian relief bill, I wanted at least to put myself on record, or into the RECORD, as to my position on that bill, but the opportunity went by. We are, as an old friend of mine who was entirely illiterate used to say, "just talking at randledom" to-day, and while we are talking that way I seize the opportunity to make a few remarks on that matter, and one other on which I want to speak a little later. A colleague of mine spoke perhaps just a little reproachfully of our voting against any appropriation to save the lives of starving children. Now, I have been chairman of the Near East Relief Committee in my home county and have put a good deal of time and a good deal of energy and some money into the Near East relief. I have gone before my fellow citizens in a number of addresses and appealed to them to donate money for the purpose of saving the starving children and starving peoples generally of Europe and the East. I am heartily in favor of the move to save those people. I am glad to give a reasonable amount myself, and appeal to my fellow citizens everywhere to do the same. But we may differ as to the plan on which a thing of that kind will be done, and yet all be equally conscientious and all be equally sympathetic and equally anxious to relieve suffering. I think I told this House once the story of a little boy who said, "A fellow said my sister was red-headed and I licked him." A gentleman said, "Well, what color is your sister's hair?" He said, "I ain't got no sister, but I was just fighting on the principle." [Laughter.] Well, on the principle I do not feel we have the right to donate and appropriate money raised by taxation to the relief of suffering or to a charity matter and I could not conscientiously vote that way. Now, in any matter of that kind, as I say, we may differ. But I believe in building churches, and I believe every community ought to have good churches. I believe in sustaining good conditions of every kind—social, intellectual, and moral—in every community, but the question of appropriating tax money, for instance, for a board of supervisors of a county to build a church in a community would be a question not to be considered. And as we are on that idea of the method by which these things are to be done and the principles on which we may agree and disagree, though I understand that we are not to discuss at all to-day the antilynching bill and I am not going to discuss that bill, I want to extend my expression of appreciation to some of the gentlemen who spoke in favor of that bill the other day, especially my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the Member from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I approve generally the ideas they expressed, and I approve the spirit in which they expressed them. They and I may differ as to methods by which that unspeakable, horrible evil may be suppressed, but we agree thoroughly on the principle that it ought to be suppressed. And so we may agree on principles and disagree on methods in many matters of legislation.

Now, some of us Democrats got lost the other evening, you know [laughter], and some of my good friends on the other side of the House have been impertinent enough to inquire where I was that afternoon. [Laughter.] I do not know that I am required to answer that question as to just where I was, but I do want to say this: I was out in an effort to do something for the Republican Party, something to help the Republican Party. [Laughter.] Part of the afternoon I was down at the Post Office Department trying to get two Democrats into postal positions down in my district, and by so doing trying to save the Republican Party [laughter], and in a very scriptural way or by a very scriptural method. Of course, we are not supposed to talk Scripture here very much; we are not supposed to know much Scripture. And we are not supposed to talk very much about religion, because we are not supposed to know very much about religion. Yet this House is organized on a scriptural basis entirely. That is to say, we have the sheep on the right side and the goats on the left side. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. On the right or on the left? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWREY. On the right and on the left. And, furthermore, the Scripture says, "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." And, again, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." [Laughter.] It is not entirely out of order to talk about things from the scriptural standpoint. I was out to help you that evening, and some of you reproached me for it. I was trying to put in a little salt. [Laughter.] Salt, you know, is a saving element. Some one has said that Jesus Christ was a great democrat. Of course, that may have been a Republican preacher who said that, and he was not speaking of democracy as we speak of it, in the popular meaning, but in the original meaning of the word. I realize that He was talking good democracy when He said, "Ye are the salt of the earth," and perhaps talking to democratic people when he used that language. The object of salt is to save things, to purify them, and to keep them from putrefaction.

Mr. KING. The gentleman is not talking about Epsom salts, is he?

Mr. LOWREY. No. I am talking about salt, not Epsom salts. If the gentleman is especially in need of Epsom salts he can go down to a drug store and talk about that. I am talking about salt. Salt is to save something from putrefaction. I was trying to put a little salt in the management of the post offices down in Mississippi by putting in two Democrats on that day. [Laughter.] I was doing that on the saving principle. We have a House divided. Salt is the saving power, and some of you gentlemen accuse me of dodging my duty in trying to do something for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. What success did the gentleman have?

Mr. LOWREY. I think my prospects are very good, from the fact that the Republicans who were applying against my friends were not sufficiently respectable to stand much chance, and I think the Republican referees are going to recommend the friends I have suggested. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I was wondering whether or not the gentleman was present yesterday when the subject of churches was mentioned. Some gentlemen were charged with not being church members, and later we found that they were all church members. Did the gentleman find the exemplification of that scriptural text, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity"? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWREY. Oh, yes; I found "how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity"; but I am speaking now of the reproach that some of you gentlemen cast upon us that evening for absenting ourselves and trying to help the Republican Party.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was listening to the gentleman carefully, but I did not catch the time that the gentleman referred to when he spoke of "how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Was that when we had the tax bill up? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWREY. The time I was referring to was when we were discussing the subject yesterday afternoon.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Knowing how very conscientious my friend is and how desirous he is to put in a full day's work for a full day's pay, even when the Government is the paymaster, I was curious to know why my friend sought that afternoon to go to departmental work when we usually find him in his chair here? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWREY. I would be glad to answer the question if I had the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. May I have two minutes additional?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for two minutes additional.

Mr. LOWREY. It was because Christmas was coming, and I had more departmental work than I could well attend to. My Democratic friends generally seemed to be engaged in the same important line of missionary work that evening, and I thought it would be a good thing to join them. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention for a minute to the condition that exists up in the district of the Chevalier della Corona d'Italia, otherwise known as Mr. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, of Massachusetts. I am sorry he is not here. He classifies himself as having the right to use that distinguished title, he being the handyman, I believe, of the King of Italy. He also has been exceedingly diligent in endeavoring to disfranchise a good many of the Southern States, including mine, because we have enforced proper legislation and proper constitutional regulations as to the ballot down there and have honestly enforced them. In a Boston paper published by colored people, called the Chronicle, I find the following:

> In ward 13 two colored men won the election to the legislature, but they were counted out. It is even said with some shadow of truth that this same Republican leader used his Negro puppets for this direful purpose. They took their cause to a Republican legislature, but to no purpose, because they had been framed by this same Republican boss before the election. George P. Taylor, an estimable, trained, and clean man, secured the nomination to the senate from the sixth Suffolk district, but he too was opposed and defeated by these same subtle influences.
> Are such things possible in Massachusetts? We have been hearing from Massachusetts and other Northern States the last 50 years that the "counting out" of Negro candidates for office was an offense confined to the "States lately in rebellion," but here we have the direct accusation from Negro sources in the city of Boston that it is a Bostonian crime.
> At least a third of a century has passed since a charge was brought that a Negro candidate for the legislature in South Carolina was "counted out."

Now, by referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where we find what is the title of this distinguished gentleman who desires to disfranchise the South because they properly enforce constitutional regulations as to the ballot, we find that the thirteenth ward is in his district in the city of Boston. We find that Suffolk County is also in his district, and I want to know what the chevalier is doing at home when he is becoming so enthusiastic about the suppression of the colored vote in South Carolina. You will note that this is not a gang of Democrats that is doing this. The colored man who edits this paper says it is a Republican boss who had it done. He can not lay that on any combination between Mr. GALLIVAN and Mr. TAGUE and the Republicans, because it was a Republican boss backed up by a Repulican legislature that defeated the rights of those people. I have sometimes heard it charged that there might be an illicit combination between the Republican and Democratic machines in the city of Boston, but this is not a child of that unholy alliance and that unholy combination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a charge laid at the door of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], and it is laid at his door by the people whom he claims to befriend each day that he comes here. He never appears here except when he wants to say something about that. Now, since the 1st day of January, 1896, there has been a regulation in my State by a contitutional enactment whereby a man must be able to read the Constitution, or he must have $300 worth of property on the tax books, or he can not register and he can not vote. That provision has been enforced to the letter, and no colored man's vote has been thrown out because he was a colored man, or for any other reason, whenever he was able to qualify under that provision, but he has been allowed to vote and his vote has been counted honestly. In one of the counties of that State after that went into effect there were as many colored people qualified to vote as there were white people, and what did we do? We did not count them out. They were allowed to vote and their votes were counted, and they sent to the legislature one of the two representatives from that country. They came up and asked for that division. When I used to be speaker of the house of representatives in South Carolina there was a little colored man there representing Georgetown County. He had half of the representation from that county because we allowed them to have what they were entitled to under our constitution and under our enactment, in so far as that was concerned. There were also colored men in the convention that made the constitution. A good many people used to come down from Massachusetts and stop in Columbia. They were often brought into the house of representatives. They were frequently rather prominent, and they would be brought up and introduced to me as the speaker of the house. The first question they always asked was, "Which is the Democratic side and which is the Republican side of the house?" I used to take a good deal of pleasure in pointing out to Mr. TINKHAM'S constituents this little colored man, as black as any you ever saw, and tell them, "There is the Republican side of the house." But he was there, as an evidence of our good faith, and an evidence of the fact that we do better by them than they do in the district represented by Mr. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, the Chevalier de la Corona d'Italia, or, in other words, the handy man to the King of Italy. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina yields back three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX] 20 minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the attitude of the House. I know how hard it is in a big country like ours and in a great body like this to get any cause properly considered. So many causes are clamoring for consideration that only those things have our attention which are pressed upon us. I shall impose upon the House now. My only apology is the command of duty. I call your attention again to the enforcement of your immigration laws.

First I read you a statement by Secretary of Labor Davis contained in the Washington Evening Star of December 19, 1921:

> SECRETARY DAVIS ALSO ASKS DIPLOMATIC ACTION OVER IMMIGRANT QUESTION.
> The maximum fine under the immigration laws has been ordered assessed against the British Cunard Steamship Line by Secretary of Labor Davis, who has also asked the State Department to make diplomatic representations to the British Government against what he classes "as a bold and, I believe, a knowing attempt on the part of the company to violate the immigration laws, either because of the paltry profits to be gained thereby or to discredit our immigration policy."
> Secretary Davis will recommend imposition of fines on steamship companies totaling $1,050,000, he said to-day. The fine will be imposed, if the Secretary's wish is carried out, for alleged violation of the immigration laws, in which the steamship companies have brought to this country immigrants in excess of the quotas of the countries from which the immigrants came.
> "It is the crime of the age," Mr. Davis said, following a conference this morning with Assistant Secretary Henning; Theodore Risley, Solicitor for the Department of Labor; and W. W. Husband, Commissioner General of Immigration. Mr. Davis pointed out that in thousands of cases immigrants sell their homes and spend all the money on passage to this country. When they are turned back, he said, they are frequently landed at ports many hundreds of miles from their former homes and have no funds to reach their former place of residence. Thousands of immigrants have had their lives ruined and their life savings wiped out by the avarice of the steamship companies, he added.
> The circumstance complained of arises out of the arrival on December 10 at New York of the liner Aquitania with 300 Hungarian immigrants, notwithstanding that on December 1 the Immigration Bureau had announced to all steamship lines that the quota of immigrants from Hungary legally entitled to enter the United States up to July, 1922, was exhausted. Mr. Davis likewise addressed a letter to Attorney General Daugherty asking for a legal opinion as to what action can be taken in "an appalling situation which has arisen by the reckless disregard of the law by steamship companies."

CONSTANT CONTROVERSY WITH LINES.

Since the enforcement of the new immigration act, which limits the number of aliens entitled to enter the United States in any one year to a definite percentage of the number of that nationality already resident in the United States, the immigration authorities have been in practically constant controversy with steamship lines, which they have charged with deliberate intent to make the law futile. The situation has been enlivened by midnight races to the port of entry between vessels carrying immigrant cargoes from countries whose dwindling quotas made it probable that arrivals on the last vessels would be excluded and deported.

"The chief offender in this instance was the Cunard liner Aquitania," Mr. Davis said, in his letter of protest to Secretary of State Hughes, "which arrived at New York on or about December 10 with somewhat more than 300 of this nationality (Hungarian) on board."

This vessel is said to have sailed from Cherbourg on or about December 4, it being understood that the Hungarians were embarked at this port. Some of these aliens were admissible under exemptions found in the law, but at the last count 204 of them had been found to be mandatorily excluded from admission.

FINES AS PREVENTION.

Writing to the Attorney General, Mr. Davis said that, in his opinion, "the awful wrong being perpetrated on these poor aliens can not be prevented except by the imposition of these fines. The heart of Americans is shocked at this mercenary practice, and demands that some one be punished for the great wrong that is being done them."

"I am giving instructions that fines be imposed," Mr. Davis continued. "Unquestionably opposition to this course will be made at the very threshold. Will you be good enough to give me your opinion as to whether, under the law, fines may properly be imposed on these steamship companies?"

Secretary Davis says that this is the crime of the age. It is an age long crime as well. He tells of the inhumanities to which the poor victims are subjected. The facts appear to justify that statement. This is not a temporary attitude of theirs. It has been maintained for a hundred years or longer. If the people of the United States want enforcement of this law in which they are so much interested, they must deal with this as a deep-seated, stubborn trouble.

One cause of the difficulty is the fact that many of these lines are under foreign flags and come only partially under our jurisdiction and that many of their activities are beyond our borders. The prime motive, of course, is money making.

You will find the history of American immigration full of trouble much akin to this and arising from similar causes. The slave trade was but a phase of it. The profit of that business was in the difference between the price paid for the poor victim and the price obtained for him when he was sold here. They were a kind of emigrants, unwilling, it is true; but men captured them in the wilds of the dark continent and sold them, apparently controlled by about the same moral conception, brought them over here and sold them. And when our fathers gathered together to write the Constitution they found the evil in existence and could not agree on the manner in which it should be eradicated. They patched up a compromise and made it effective some 25 years after the constitutional convention, about 1808. There arose out of that the most serious troubles that the Government and people of the United States have had.

The remnants of that trouble divide us yet and distract our attention from problems that should have our consideration. We are suffering now from the consequences that come upon us 100 years after these wrongs were committed.

That attitude on the part of steamship lines, mainly foreign, has come down through our entire history. When we undertook first to establish an immigration policy they resisted it. The State of Massachusetts, the State of New York, the State of Louisiana, the State of California, and perhaps other States, tried to deal with the question and were resisted at every step by foreign steamship lines. Then, after it was determined that the Congress of the United States had exclusive jurisdiction of the matter and it was dealt with by Congress, still the story of their dealing with this subject has been a story of crime. It is a story of greed, defiance of law, and inhumanity. The trouble is deep-seated and stubborn and requires our thoughtful attention. We will not obtain results by doing this to-day and that to-morrow, by resolving this now and changing our policy to-morrow, by making a law now and destroying or refusing to enforce it to-morrow.

I call your attention to a few bits of history in connection with the subject.

I read from volume 2 of the report of the United States Immigration Commission, page 589, which I cite as "I. C. R.":

> Prior to the year 1819 there were no United States laws governing or regulating ocean passenger traffic. * * * As a result abuses were permitted and practiced on transporting vessels that caused distress, disease, and death, especially among immigrants bound for America. (2 I. C. R., 589.)

Further, the fact that the protection given by the law—> * * * was inadequate is shown by the gruesome records of the steerage experiences in those days. (2 I. C. R., 591.)

> From the beginning of the movement of population from Europe to the New World suffering and death were common on immigrant ships. Among the earlier instances recorded was that of 3,000 Palatines forwarded * * * by England to New York, 470 of whom died on the voyage and 250 soon after their arrival of ship fever. There is also a gruesome account * * * of experiences on a ship which sailed in 1731 for America from Rotterdam with 156 immigrants. She was bound for Philadelphia via Falmouth. When she had been at sea eight weeks the passengers were put on short allowances, and during the last five weeks of their journey were unable to obtain bread. Finally they were paying 18 pence for a rat and 6 pence for a mouse. (2 I. C. R., 589.)
> Upon the increased demand for transportation to the United States following the close of the second war with England many vessels which had originally been constructed solely for the purpose of transporting freight were hurriedly transposed into immigrant ships that they might enjoy some of the profits of a business that had become lucrative. This, with the fact that excessive overcrowding had been practiced on all vessels, rendered the condition of emigrants at sea almost unbearable. (2 I. C. R., 590.)
> The potato famine in Ireland occurred in 1847, and in consequence there was a great increase in emigration from that country. (2 I. C. R., 591.)
> Famine-stricken Ireland was also fever-ridden; * * * the disease was carried aboard ship, where in the overcrowded and poorly ventilated steerage quarters thousands died of ship fever and thousands more survived the voyage only to die after landing.
> Thousands of Irish and other British emigrants died during the voyage to Canada, and at Grasse Island, near Quebec, where the Canadian quarantine station was located, as many as 7,000 emigrants perished from ship fever and cholera in 1847 alone. (2 I. C. R., 592.)

In 1819, 1847, and 1855 laws were passed by Congress to limit crowding and prevent the starving of immigrants, but these were opposed, avoided, and disregarded by the shipping concerns. The Immigration Commission says:

> It may well be questioned whether the condition surrounding the transportation of emigrant passengers had been improved by any of these laws. (2 I. C. R., 593.)

I am reading from the report of the Immigration Commission composed of men like Hon. John Burnett, Senator DILLINGHAM, Senator LODGE, and Prof. Jenks, appointed 14 or 15 years ago, whose report was filed some 12 years ago.

What are we going to do about it? The chairman of the Immigration Committee presented a resolution here the other day purporting to deal with it, but it was resisted by some of us and was withdrawn by the gentleman, probably not for lack of votes but for some purpose satisfactory to him. He had it inserted in the RECORD, and I presume it will come up in the future for consideration.

On the same day that it was before the House the Commissioner General of Immigration was before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. I have his testimony before me and will read a part of it. After the reading of that resolution admitting these people excluded by the law, a copy of which is in the RECORD of December 19, he was asked:

> Do you think a resolution of that kind running for a period of time coincident with the emergency act would break the act down?
> Mr. HUSBAND. Very largely.
> The CHAIRMAN. In what way?
> Mr. HUSBAND. That it would continue to admit a very considerable number of people—that is, it would permit considerable additions to the quotas of certain countries which are already exhausted. (Hearings Dec. 19, 1921, testimony Mr. Husband, p. 24, typewritten report.)

Again—

> Mr. BOX. Now, Mr. Husband, you stated in answer to the chairman's question that the resolution would very largely break down the quota law. I will ask you if it is not a fact that in an effort to enforce this law faithfully you are having very great difficulty now with the law standing right square at your back as a brace? Isn't that a difficult task, in your position?
> Mr. HUSBAND. It is an impossible task.
> Mr. BOX. Now, if we modify it and put a lot of things like that in it and leave it to regulations to be provided by you and by your superiors in office, and make it dependent on the regulations fixed by you in the goodness of your heart, will it not be more difficult to enforce a fixed rule when the regulation is resting within your breast instead of in the will of Congress? Won't that make it more difficult?
> Mr. HUSBAND. That is it, Mr. Box, that when it was difficult under a law it would be even more difficult under a regulation. (Hearings, Dec. 19, 1921, testimony Mr. Husband, p. 30, typewritten report.)

Those are the exact words of the Commissioner General of Immigration. Gentlemen will understand that it is proposed that we set aside the law and say that it shall be done according to the regulations of the Commissioner General of Immigration. He has been having considerable difficulty in enforcing the law. The difficulties will be increased if regulations are substituted for law. I must say of him and his associates that there is much evidence of earnest effort to enforce this law under the very greatest difficulty.

Mr. Chairman, a large number of immigrants, the number being unascertainable at this time, are awaiting admission, standing at the door, though the quotas are exhausted—nobody knows how many are or will be waiting. The Commissioner of Immigration was asked how many people there are. He could give the number now at Ellis Island and some at other ports. Then he said there were some at quarantine, and there were some down in the bay in other ships. He could not state how many there are in all.

When asked if he had any knowledge of the number now afloat moving toward America he said that he did not have.

When asked if he had any assurance that if people in excess of the quota from various countries were now admitted large numbers of others would not continue to come during the remaining six months of the year during which the quota law is yet to run, he answered that he had no such assurance. The language is:

Mr. BOX. Mr. Husband, what assurance have you that they are not going to continue to bring them?

Mr. HUSBAND. None at all.

Mr. BOX. How long have these quotas been exhausted in some of these countries?

* * * * * * *

Mr. HUSBAND. Syria, Palestine, other Asia, Greece, other Europe, have been exhausted for weeks and weeks.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BOX. If I may continue, Mr. Chairman—have any of these who have arrived recently come from those countries whose quotas have been exhausted for weeks?

Mr. HUSBAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. BOX. They continue to come after this quota has been exhausted, for weeks?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes. I just learned to-day—I did not know it before—that 57 or 67 so-called Assyrians were at Boston. They are from Persia and therefore from "other Asia," and that quota was exhausted during the early days of July, the first of the fiscal year. I think within the year it has been exhausted two or three times over.

Mr. BOX. Who brought those people from Assyria?

Mr. HUSBAND. The recent lot at Boston, the Favre Line steamship Canada. (Hearings Dec. 19, 1921, testimony Mr. Husband, pp. 7, 8, typewritten report.)

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. What would be the difficulty of putting up the bars on the other side and seeing to it that nobody is brought across who is not qualified to enter?

Mr. BOX. The gentleman asks a question on a point toward which the thinking of every one nearly who is dealing with the question has been directed. We have found it exceedingly difficult. In the first place, the United States can not exercise its sovereign power across the seas. We can not establish bureaus and agencies in foreign countries to do that which is not acceptable to the people there. We can not control by our will the embarkation of emigrants from Europe. It is to be hoped that sooner or later we will get the consent of the foreign countries and put in effect a system of visé that will enable us to regulate the business much better than it is now regulated, but the difficulty is much greater than appears upon the mere statement of the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asked me to take charge of the time in his absence. I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 minutes' additional time.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Are any efforts being made to have an understanding with foreign countries so that this can be remedied?

Mr. BOX. I think efforts have been made. I do not know whether this question has been taken up with the definite detail we would like to see characterize it, but my information is that some countries, especially those anxious to get rid of their surplus population, do not cooperate with our authorities in this.

Many foreign Governments derive a revenue from this emigration carrying sea traffic. They are interested in it in that way, and possibly in the profits of steamship lines. It is certain that they are anxious to have a lot of their people come here. Up to this time we have not been able to get such cooperation from them as will enable us to control its embarkation, where it should be controlled.

Mr. LAZARO. Does the gentleman believe that these things about which we complain can be remedied unless we have an understanding with the foreign countries so that those people who wish to come to America can be examined and qualified on the other side?

Mr. BOX. I would not admit that it can not be otherwise dealt with. I must confess that great difficulty attends it. I think that if we had a method of enforcing penalties against carriers who knowingly violate the law, that would tend to remedy the situation. The testimony shows the steamship companies know those quotas. They are shown to have figured them out. They know when the quotas are exhausted. They know as much about it as our department, but they continue to unload them. They have the money of the poor victims, as stated by the Secretary, and then is raised the cry of distress among these orphans, hungry people, divided families, and other unfortunates that appeals to the American heart, and we get weak, and refuse to enforce the law. We make a big move in this direction one day and turn in another direction to-morrow. These owners of foreign steamship lines simply smile in contempt at our pretense of enforcing the law, and carry on the traffic. We admit them again and say "Just this once."

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas permit me to make a very short statement in this connection?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I have read a good many very interesting articles on this question of immigration, and the consensus of opinion is, I believe, that these difficulties of which the gentleman complains will never be remedied until we can put up the bars on the other side. It seems to me some effort ought to be made by the department here to have an understanding with the foreign countries so that that difficulty will be remedied, because it is surely in the interest of the poor immigrants who come here, and it is undoubtedly the cause of our weakening very much and putting the bars down to let them in.

Mr. BOX. The magazine writers can fix it easily to their own satisfaction, because they do not know much about the practical and administrative details of it. I stated to the gentleman that perhaps some effort has been made. I am not willing to admit that the only control we have of it is subject to the will of foreign powers.

If they will not consent to handle this important traffic as we think it should be handled, we must not get weak about it. We must find a way to enforce our laws without the consent of foreign countries. The very moment we undertake to deal with Japan or any foreign power wanting to unload its surplus population on us on a strictly treaty basis, as if this were a matter for international agreement, as if it were not a matter entirely within our control, we make a very dangerous surrender. When we do that we are getting on dangerous ground. We must never, never admit that we have not the right, the absolute right, to control it. Our understanding and fixedness of purpose ought to be such that we will be able to control it ourselves.

Mr. LAZARO. I hope the gentleman will understand that I did not mean to say that we ought to compromise with foreign countries on that point. I fully agree with the gentleman that it is the question of peoples of every country to say who shall come in and who shall stay out. My idea was that it would never be remedied until we put up the bars on the other side. I think we have the right to do it.

Mr. BOX. That is not our field to inclose. We can not exercise regulation over there. We have no assurance that they will consent to our doing that. We have no power to do it without their consent. What they have done in the past indicates that they will not consent. We do not want to admit that we can control it in no other way. I think that the bills introduced by the chairman of the committee and by my colleague on the committee [Mr. CABLE] and perhaps by other gentlemen tend in the right direction. We should impose penalties, with such definitions of the crime as will advise the steamship companies in advance clearly and definitely what is a violation of the law, and then stand by our guns. Then when some one comes here and cries because the law pinches we must not surrender. We must demand that the laws be enforced. We must maintain the policy we have adopted. When the law is written let us stand by it. Let us not change our course with every wind. Let us not be playing at it. [Applause.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, allow me briefly to call the attention of the committee to a little legislative history. This body a few months ago passed by a very large majority an act intended to restrict immigration. The restriction was thorough, but it had certain exceptions in the interest of humanity excepting certain blood relations. On the floor of the House those exceptions were somewhat enlarged, enlarged considerably beyond the idea of the committee, enlarged so far that the committee thought that the act would largely fail of its original purpose, but at all events it was an attempt to restrict immigration, the first time, I might say, that had been attempted since 1907, except for the further restriction of anarchists and some other classes which we passed in the last Congress. Well, that bill went over to the Senate. The Senate passed an idea of their own of a 3 per cent restriction law. We knew very well——

Mr. STEVENSON. Was not the first restriction about five years ago—known as the literacy test?

Mr. VAILE. More than five years ago, and it was a restriction passed under the leadership of that distinguished, patriotic American, the Hon. John L. Burnett, chairman of the Committee on Immigration for many years, one of the most patriotic and farseeing Americans who ever sat in this House, if I may say so. But let me remind you of how the question came up in the last Congress. The Senate voted for the percentage limitation of 3 per cent of those who were here under the census of 1910. That act has been a beneficial act. It had the effect of restricting the flow to this country of the hordes from the war-ridden and distressed countries of Europe, of multitudes of people whom, however much we might sympathize with them, we could not possibly hope to assimilate en masse. But it has produced the very troubles which we of this House, the gentleman from Texas among the rest, anticipated it would produce, and the reason that it has produced those troubles is because any immigration act, as was said very properly by a witness before our committee the other day, deals not with sacks of flour, deals not with money, deals not with indebtedness owed by foreign countries, but deals with human beings, deals with flesh and blood, and any merely mathematical restriction act will not remedy that.

I prefer our own act which was passed by the House to that one passed by the Senate and which we accepted as being at all events a restriction, even with its faults; but any mathematical restrictive act has the limitations which I have mentioned.

Now, before I proceed further I want to pay my most sincere compliments, my heartfelt compliments, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], who has just spoken. I know his heart is thoroughly American. I know that he is an American to his heart's core. I have seen him, at a great personal sacrifice, and, I might add, at a great personal risk to his return to this Congress, adopt a policy that was entirely American, a policy that was thoroughly patriotic and thoroughly consistent with his duty on this great subject, which goes to the heart's blood of the American people. But the gentleman comes from a district where they do not have quite the same problem as those of us who come from the North have. He comes from a district where they do not have much of an immigration problem. He sees clearly with the eye of patriotism, but he sees from a distance, and consequently he does not see all the details. I think he will concede that those on the Republican side are equally desirous of protecting the blood of the American race, and I think he will also concede that we have a somewhat peculiar difficulty confronting us, and the difficulty comes from the fact that we are dealing with human beings and not with sacks of flour.

Very well. We passed this 3 per cent immigration law to put restrictions on immigration to the United States. I believe in the law, but I think we could have something better, and we are going to propose something better. But what has happened under the 3 per cent immigration law? The total immigration permissible to the United States during the current fiscal year is about 355,000. In the time that has elapsed since the 1st of last June—there is one extra month, or part of a month, in there—in that time we have admitted about 190,000 under the quota law. If we had not had the quota law our immigration in this period would surely have exceeded three-quarters of a million.

The quota law has amply justified itself as a restrictive measure for the protection of the United States, especially at a time when our citizens, including many who fought for us overseas, are walking the streets in search of work. But it is not exactly the right kind of a restrictive law, and that is shown by the fact that in these seven months we have had to admit a total of some thirteen hundred in excess of the quotas for the different months, and in some cases in excess of the entire quotas of countries whose quotas have been exhausted. The principle of restriction has been established. We have served notice on the world that the United States has forever ceased to be a dumping ground. But on account of the dictates of simple humanity we have found that there are a few—thirteen hundred is an insignificant number; it is only one-tenth of 1 per cent of our total immigration in 1908—who have had to be admitted, because to exclude them would violate every principle of humanity. What, for example, are you going to do with 10 Armenian orphans, whose parents were killed and whose homes were destroyed by the Turks. Where are you going to put them if you put them out of the United States? These few exceptions show both the benefits of the law and the necessity for some slight leeway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, may I have a little more time?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Why have we admitted those? We have admitted those because they are not sacks of flour.

Let me give you some idea of a few of this class, and I beg the House to understand that I am as much in favor of restricting this country to the blood of the people who made it as any other man in this House. When I say "the blood of the people who made it" I mean those that have helped in the process all along and not merely at the start.

Here comes a Jewish rabbi to my State. He is admitted as one of the professional classes exempted under the law. He came here six months ago. He is educated, healthy, clean, reputable in every way. All right. Six months after he is admitted as one of the exempted class along comes his family, a large family. They believe, as our ancestors believed, in large families.

He has seven children. One of them was born on the ship coming over. They come from Poland. Here is a mother with seven children, all under the age of 14, one of them a babe suckling at her breast. Where are you going to send them? Back to Poland? Have they any place to go? Have they anyone to take care of them? They have not a soul in the whole world except the husband and father, who is here.

The criticism which is leveled here on this floor to-day, with all due respect to my friend from Texas [Mr. Box], is not leveled at a Commissioner General of Immigration who was unlike his predecessor, who admitted radicals and anarchists. Perhaps that gentleman was glad to have them. This criticism is leveled at a Commissioner General of Immigration who——

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I submit to the gentleman that I did not criticize the Commissioner General of Immigration. I am trying to sustain him. I am trying to get support for the Commissioner General of Immigration in his efforts to enforce the law.

Mr. VAILE. I am glad to hear that the gentleman was not criticizing the Commissioner of Immigration.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Until those cases are disposed of, will it not be absolutely impossible to enforce the law?

Mr. VAILE. Yes. The committee is in favor of such a plan, and of a plan to have inspections on the other side.

Let me give you another case. Here comes an old lady. She has five sons here. Four of them are citizens of the United States and fought in our Army. The other one has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. All five are in reasonably prosperous circumstances. It is reasonable for them to want to take care of their mother and have her with them. Can the old lady come in? Not under our present 3 per cent law, because the quota from that country is exhausted. Now, I am in favor of enforcing that 3 per cent law in such a way as will restrict immigration, but I think we ought to have modifications. Here comes a man's wife. The man has been a soldier of the United States and has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. Our 3 per cent law admits a nurse, as one of the professional classes, but it does not admit a man's wife.

Gentlemen of the committee, stand behind us. Let us give you a reasonably restrictive law. I beg you to believe that your committee is, almost to a man, in favor of preserving the American blood which has made this Nation. But while we must remember this we must not forget that this American Nation stands for humanity. While we believe sincerely in our own kind of humanity, I do not think we should absolutely close the door of hope against the wives and the children and the aged parents of those who have established their rightful claim to residence here under our laws, a claim equal to that of men who, like myself, come from a long line of citizens born on this continent. Tracing it back as far as I know, I do not believe that since the beginning of the Republic I have had an ancestor who was not born in the United States of America. But we all realize that a boy coming over here from Poland or some other country may have it in him to be just as good an American as some boys who were born here.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. What tribe does the gentleman come from? [Laughter.]

Mr. VAILE. I will not carry my ancestry back too far, but I will say that as far back as the Declaration of Independence I belong to the tribe of Americans. I will limit it to that. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, when a newspaper man gets a sincere letter of commendation complimentary to his paper he sometimes runs the letter in the paper so that the world may know what some folks think of it.

I have just received a very fine letter from a friend of mine in Pueblo, Colo., expressing his appreciation of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I think others should see. Coming from a man of high attainments, well posted on the history and literature of the country, and well informed as to current events, I feel that his opinion is worth something.

The letter referred to is as follows:

2323 GREENWOOD,
PUEBLO, COLO., December 6, 1921.

Hon. GUY U. HARDY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARDY: I have your letter of 3d, about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I thank you for remembering me in this connection.

I have never been able to understand the jokes some people make about the RECORD. To me it is a living, vital thing. I never get a number without going through it from beginning to end. I know the characteristics of nearly every Senator and of most of the prominent Members of the House. They are to me just as characters in the books of Dickens or Thackeray. The RECORD is simply a "continued story" with me and the characters are real. I have found more brilliant oratory, more profound reasoning and facts in the RECORD than in any other place. It has contributed more to my education since I have been getting it than any other agency. In my scheme of things it is indispensable to me; I do not know how I could get along without it, and every time I pick up a copy I think of you and your kindness.

I truly hope you can continue to get it to me.

With warm regards, I am, sincerely,

J. L. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. VAILE. Which tribe does Mr. Woodbridge belong to?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. One hundred per cent American. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN] such time as he desires.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I will not take advantage of the privilege accorded to me to consume much of the time of the House, Mr. Chairman, but I desire to say that the discussion of immigration matters has been very enlightening and helpful, I am sure, not only to those present but will be to those who will read the RECORD, both Members of the House and others like the broad-minded gentleman from Pueblo, whose letter has just been read.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to suggest to the members of the Immigration Committee an idea as to how the restrictive measures might be extended even without the previous negotiation and ratification of treaties. It is in this way: While we do not control the gates on the other side from which the immigrants come to this country, it is equally true that we do control the ports of entry on this side, and after a consideration of the matter on both sides of the pond, studying it on Ellis Island, hearing numbers of cases tried in the courts there, and considering international law generally with reference to it, I believe this Congress could pass a statute which, in addition to the literacy test, inspection for disease, and so on, would make it necessary before an immigrant could be landed that his passport should be viséed by an American officer and should be accompanied by a certificate and a questionnaire signed by the nearest American consul in the country from which the immigrant comes to the effect that this man's character and his purpose in coming to this country have undergone and passed investigation. It is not only necessary that a man be able to read and write. In fact, some—not all, but some—of the best citizens this country has had from its foundation were men of very limited education, and some of them, perhaps, could not even read or write at all. But the character of a man and his purpose in coming here are more important than anything else; and while the present law prohibits the making of contracts before admission, I believe that law could be amended so as to provide that if a farmer in this country could get in touch through the Immigration Bureau with men on the other side who were willing to come to this country to be farm laborers, in that way we could bring to this country a more desirable class of immigrants, not men who were wanting to sell bananas and peddle fruit and do the chores around our enormous cities and swell the urban population, but to become producers of the things that the men of this country and of the world must eat and wear.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has the gentleman considered the fact that it is a little peculiar that our laws with regard to immigration provide that if a man comes in under contract, or even if he comes on the strength of a letter from his brother saying that a job is ready for him, he is debarred because of that, and at the same time if a man comes with no likelihood of employment he is deported because of his likelihood to become a public charge? Is not that an incongruity in the law?

Mr. MCSWAIN. That is the very proposition to which I was going to call the attention of the House and of the country. I want to say that I have discussed this matter in person in lodges of the Junior Order of American Mechanics, of which I am a member, and which is so deeply interested in this matter, as you all know, and I find that the minds of the members are very receptive to the suggestion that while the original law restricting the bringing in of immigrants under contract was perhaps instigated by that order, yet I believe that the order is now willing to see an amendment to the effect that if the character of the man is certified and viséed as O. K., and the purpose of his coming appears affirmatively to be a good one, the man should come in, and that, if necessary, a good American citizen might be allowed to pay the way of that man to this country in order that he might come here and be a producer. Three of the best citizens that ever lived in my section of the country, in the very neighborhood where I was born, were German boys, two of whom had served in the German Army in the Franco-Prussian War, and who came to this country under contract, and two of them worked for my grandfather on his farm. All of them became landowners. Every one of them raised a large family. They were law-abiding people and were among our very best citizens. All three of these Germans were members of the same church into whose membership I was inducted as a boy.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWAIN. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. May I suggest that cases like those mentioned by the gentleman must not be permitted to enlarge the opportunity for the continuance, much less the enlargement, of the greater evil at which this provision is aimed. For instance, there is abundant testimony before our committee that a large number of Spaniards have been brought to the United States during this year, and when industrial conditions became bad they were left in the midst of various communities in great numbers. One community in Connecticut, New Brighton, I believe, had a large number of them, believed to have been imported for specific labor, who had to be deported at the expense of that community and of the State of Connecticut. We have information that a large number of undesirable laborers have been brought to this country from Spain to work in certain great industries. If this safeguard is removed there will be great danger of a repetition of that transaction on a very large scale.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would not suggest a general repeal of such restrictions. I only suggest for consideration certain exceptions after all the investigations have been made that I have mentioned, and after wise discretion is vested in the Bureau of Immigration for the purpose of passing upon the merits of each particular application.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the following title:

H. R. 6557. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto Rico and to pay for same out of the duties collected in Porto Rico.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few observations with reference to a bill introduced in the House yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE], which undertakes to penalize the formation of what he is pleased to call "blocs" in either the House or the Senate of the United States.

Every time there is a temporary agitation over something, or every time there are scare headlines in the newspapers about some imaginary danger that is about to beset or overtake the Government, some peripatetic patriot rushes into the House of Representatives or the Senate and introduces a bill which is intended to save and preserve the Government from the danger of destruction about to overwhelm it. We have prided ourselves during the entire history of the Nation upon the fact that our Government was divided into three separate parts—one the legislative, another the executive, and the other the judiciary. That was a very wise division of the powers of the Government. It was so framed that neither has any authority over the other. Congress in the first place enacts legislation, the executive department is supposed to enforce it, but the executive department has no power over Congress to frame legislation, except the power of the President to approve or veto a bill, but certainly the Executive has no power over legislation or to punish either House for the performance of its duties or neglect of its duties.

The judicial authority, separate and apart from both the legislative and executive, was designed to interpret the law which is enacted by the Congress of the United States. But the judiciary division of our Government has no authority over the executive power except to interpret the laws that Congress may enact that may affect the executive branch of our Government. Certainly the judicial authority has never had the power to punish Members of Congress either for the performance of their duties or for even the willful neglect in the performance of their duties.

The only power I know of to punish Members of Congress with respect to the performance of their duties is that the Constitution confers upon Congress itself, and that authority only extends to the power of impeachment and the power of expulsion. Now, it is a wise provision, as I believe all men admit, that the legislative branch of our Government, representing the people, solving their problems as best it may, is free from fear of domination of the Executive, free from fear of punishment by the courts either by implication or by enactment of statutes giving a right to punish Members of Congress for what they may deem to be an unwise performance of their duty or the total neglect of the performance of their duty. If the Federal courts can control and punish individual Members of Congress in matters of legislation, then our system of government is at an end.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CABLE. Does the gentleman say that Congress could not yield authority to the judiciary to punish?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I think under the Constitution Congress has no power to delegate to the courts of the country the right to punish Members of Congress for what they may do on the floor of this House. And if they did have any such power to yield to the Supreme Court or the circuit court or the district court or to any court the power to hold the sword of Damocles over Members in the performance of their duty, it would be a merging of the judicial and the legislative functions which was never contemplated by the founders of the Government and would be extremely unwise if we undertook to bring it about.

Mr. CABLE. Without discussing the question of wisdom, does not the gentleman think that Congress by legislation could give the judiciary the power to punish for a violation of any law that it passed?

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt that very seriously. In the first place, the Constitution exempts Members of Congress from arrest except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The law intended to be enacted by this bill to which I refer is not covered by treason, felony, or breach of the peace because the author makes it a misdemeanor. It is not a breach of the peace, it is not a felony, and it could not be treason, and therefore he is conferring on the judiciary the power to determine whether a Member of Congress has joined a bloc of some kind, and if he has, to give the court the power to punish him, and that, of course, carries with it the power to imprison if the fine is not paid.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman referring to a bill introduced providing for some kind of a punishment for men to vote in a bloc?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Whoever introduced that bill has his mail mixed up. It was intended to be sent to some funny paper and never intended to be considered on the floor of the House. Anybody of ordinary intelligence would not ask the House of Representatives to consider such a proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield, the bill is already before the Judiciary Committee, and in view of some things I wonder whether the mail was not mixed up.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the gentleman had that in mind. I do not know who introduced it, nor do I care.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be true that the gentleman got his mail mixed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman be good enough to say just how many blocs a Member of Congress could belong to and be consistent?

Mr. BARKLEY. That depends entirely upon the divisions of his mental spectrum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suggest that it depends also on the pressure of the propaganda.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would say that if the gentleman from Washington belonged to as many blocs as he would be capable of with his wide experience, he would belong to all of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And then, after belonging to all of them, he might be a fair representative of the people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman think it will be possible in conformity with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] for Congress to waive any right that an individual Member of Congress has? For instance, could Congress as a body by passing an act of this kind commit to the judiciary the determination of the right which a Member who might be brought before that judiciary would have the power to assert under the Constitution?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course not.

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, if the Congress should pass the law it could not waive anyone's rights.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not without first having a constitutional amendment adopted taking away from the individual Member of Congress whatever rights he may now have under the Constitution.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Just as a diversion, I desire to state that for once I am proud to agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in respect to the demerits of this bill which has been introduced.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad that under this new practice which has been inaugurated here of having an old-fashioned experience meeting Members upon the Republican side are able to get together. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I feel that I ought to apologize to the House for taking up time to discuss seriously a bill of this kind. It but illustrates the anxiety and the willingness of some Members of this House to take advantage of every whimsical occasion to bring in some bill in an effort to regulate the membership of the House and thereby gain some temporary notoriety through proposing to curb the individual Members of the House in the exercise of their duties. If you can give the courts power to control the Members of Congress as to how they shall vote on one kind of legislation, you can do it as to all legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have heard it intimated—and, of course, I hear so many things intimated that I pay little attention to some of them—that some of the forces at least that were back of the maternity bill are back of this bill. Has the gentleman heard anything about that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not knowing all of the forces that are back of this bill, and being intimately acquainted with only my own force, whatever it may have been in connection with the maternity bill, I am perfectly willing to declare now that there has been no connection, marital or otherwise, between the two propositions.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. I share the opinion of the gentleman upon the subject matter of the bill, but it seems to me that it has been inspired by a suggestion contained in the President's message regarding agricultural blocs or groups.

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall immediately, of course, acquit the President of any intention to inspire a fool thing like this.

Mr. LONDON. And so shall I.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I have no doubt that the suggestion of the President, contained in his message, perhaps ignited a spark of what the gentleman thought was intelligence in his own mind when he framed the bill and dropped it into the basket as a serious legislative proposal.

Mr. Chairman, the introduction of bills of this sort is simply an evidence of the tendency of a certain type of mind which now and then finds its way within these sacred precincts, to endeavor to take away from the individual Member of Congress, be he a Senator or a Representative, the freest exercise of his intelligence, in whatever degree he may possess it, in representing those who have honored him with membership in this or in the other body. If it were constitutional or even wise to pass a bill providing that no Member of Congress should belong of a bloc, it might be just as wise and just as sensible to pass a bill that no Member of Congress should belong to a political party. It would be just as wise to say that no Member of Congress should belong to a certain denomination of religion because indirectly or remotely his training and environment in that respect might have some bearing upon his vote upon a particular legislative proposition. It might be just as wise to say that no Member of Congress should belong to a secret organization, because some of the tenets of the particular organization to which he belongs, or some of the things brought to bear upon his mental capacity as a member of the organization, or some information brought to him accidentally perhaps because of his membership, might have some bearing on the way in which he would cast his vote on a particular legislative proposition. Merely to mention the result of such legislation is to condemn it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. It seems to me, if this bill is introduced in seriousness, that it comes about 60 years too late, because the proof shows beyond any question, and no man disputes it, for it has been demonstrated time and again, that certain interests, to wit, the woolgrowers and the American woolen manufacturers got together in combination, or in bloc, and put over legislation in respect to wool and woolens.

So it seems to me this bill should have come many many years ago.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was that the combination of the shepherds and weavers to which Senator Dolliver referred?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think that is the same combination.

Mr. TINCHER. If this bill was to be seriously considered and brought on the floor and considered in Committee of the Whole, I suppose an amendment would be in order to compel Members to join a bloc?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly. If you can prohibit a man from doing a thing, you might compel him to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why——

Mr. BARKLEY. I am willing to take that side of the question if the gentleman seriously propounds the injuiry. The difference between the bloc which my friend from Arkansas referred to which existed 60 years ago and those that are now being denounced from high places and in the press is that 60 years ago, or more recent than that, the bloc to which reference was made is that then it was in secret.

They manipulated legislation not upon the floor, not in the open, not ostensibly or openly admitting that they were intending to control legislation, but now that we have some other kind of a bloc, that is formed either in the House or Senate, or some more or less imaginary organization, where men's minds come together and they vote for the interests of the people whom they represent, they are denounced. It is a high misdemeanor to belong to an agricultural "bloc" trying to get legislation for the farmers of the United States, which they have never been able to get before, but other classes of blocs have always been able to get legislation through because of the power they enjoyed, but there was no great commotion over it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How far is the bloc from the extreme left wing?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, that depends on the viewpoint. Whether small "blocs" in either House are for the best interests of the country is a question which may cause us all serious concern. But it is a little strange that the condemnation comes now so vehemently since a little legislation has been passed to give the farmers a modicum of fair treatment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. If we are going to discuss legislation that subjects Members to $5,000 fine for going into a bloc or put their heads upon the block it seems to me Members ought to know something about it, particularly before the Christmas holidays, when they might want to say some farewells. I think we ought to have more Members here. Does the gentleman object to calling in a few other Members?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly I would not object to having a few more Members, but I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts is not going to organize a filibuster and make the point of no quorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is talking about a bill, and I thought possibly he might find who the author of the bill was, and we might have the benefit of his observations.

Mr. BARKLEY. He may be in session somewhere in a bloc, for all I know, but if the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to interrupt my speech I am willing to yield the floor.

Mr. WALSH. No. I want to say to the gentleman I have no such desire. I am enjoying the remarks of the gentleman. They show good wisdom and great profundity. I have made no point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then I will yield the floor while my reputation is at its height. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think we should improve this movement by hearing a speech from the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], and I will yield such time as the gentleman from New York may desire.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not that rather dangerous?

Mr. LONDON. I understand the gentleman from Washington wants to speak for a few moments.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, before reverting to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], associated with me on the Committee on Immigration, I desire to say my attention has just been called to a dispatch telling of the death this morning of Henry Watterson, for years the dean of newspaper editors and, I believe, about the last of the old school of personal journalism. I knew Mr. Watterson—"Marse Henry." I worked for him and under his personal instructions for some time. To know him was to love and admire him. While we have great editors these days, we see the passing with Watterson of that great school of free spoken editors, which began, perhaps, with Ben Franklin; and which when the daily newspapers became popular developed Raymond of the New York Times, Horace Greeley of the Tribune, Henry Watterson, George W. Childs of the Philadelphia Ledger, Joseph B. McCullagh of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Joseph Medill of the Chicago Tribune, Harvey Scott of the Portland Oregonian, Alden J. Blethen of the Seattle Times—all gone now from this earth—and others of that old school of editors of the days when the editor was not beholden to the business office; when editors and their newspapers undertook to lead and not to follow the public. Horace Greeley, perhaps, was foremost; Henry Watterson is, I think, the last—the last certainly, although others may be in the making. O, my colleagues, as long as we shall have a Republic we shall have need of men of the Watterson type—men who dare to speak their minds on all public subjects, who are not afraid, who see clearly, and who can give ground now and then for the ultimate success of a great principle. Watterson was a Member of Congress years ago, and may we not all strive to work with that earnestness which characterized him. This leads me directly, Mr. Chairman, to what I have to say concerning the present immigration situation. In the words of another a condition, not a theory, confronts us. Can we meet it? I have here a telegram, a personal telegram, coming from a man whom I have not met, addressed to me as chairman of the committee. In these brief words it says:

> You are charged with the performance of a most trying and poignant duty, one that is rich in its moral reward.

It is signed by James W. Gerard, the former ambassador to Germany, who served the United States in most trying prewar times with dignity and honor. He has sent that telegram to me voluntarily. But, gentlemen, although I am chairman of the Immigration Committee, it does not apply to me alone. It applies to every Member of the House, for as chairman I am only one agent of this legislative body. It applies with especial force to every member of the Immigration Committee, which committee has the welfare of the United States, now and in the future, at heart as much as any committee; which committee sits long and weary hours, which hears the heart problems of the world, of distress at home, of horror abroad, and which, Mr. Chairman, finds a thousand problems tied up in the great questions of immigration, naturalization, and Americanization. What other problems mean so much for the United States now, or 10 years from now, or 50 or 100 years from now?

In passing, Mr. Chairman, let me pay a personal compliment to all of the members of the committee and to my very good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box]. Always sincere, always earnest, always for the United States, I would not offend, I do not now pretend to answer his statements. We seek the same ends. He is in a sense my right-hand man. We have had no politics in our committee—I hope we may never have—for our divisions do not fall that way.

I must say, however, that in our effort to secure restriction of immigration, we who know the United States is 20 years or 25 years too late for the true settlement of this problem, depend on the votes of Senators and Members of the House from the Southern States, who see the thing clearly, without blurred spectacles, because the problem does not have its personal side in those States, which as yet have not received a great many immigrants. The South knows, the South has long seen what we now see—some of us for the first time—that the melting pot is overloaded.

My friends, for more than 20 years before I came to Congress I have been a working restrictionist. I learned the lesson—I saw the danger—out on the Pacific coast when the little brown men first began to pour in from Japan. I saw that problem beginning. I recognized it then, and I see it now as one, my friends of the South, which will make the Negro problem look like a battered penny.

I said that I am an immigration restrictionist. I take some pride in the fact that it was the action of this House, on a report from the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, that led to the passage of a bill which, even if it was substituted for the House bill, has kept out 700,000 or 800,000 aliens in six months' time. We had to take that bill or nothing. It is well that we accepted it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not defend or propose to keep in existence all phases of a percentage law which says that a nurse, because she is a nurse, can come in from any country, regardless of any per cent, and still keeps out your mother, or my mother, because she is alien born, if either of us is able to support her. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I said at the outset that a condition confronted us. It is this: The determination of quotas did not quite fit new boundaries of countries in Europe, perhaps. Passport visé regulations did not quite fit quota regulations, perhaps. Other situations arose. I have not time to detail them. At any rate, we have been obliged to accept in the United States 1,300 or 1,400 persons in excess of quotas from countries where, in nearly every case, the quota was very small.

That excess is distributed over five months. And now under the 20 per cent maximum per month class of the law several quotas have just been exhausted, all at once, from a dozen countries with limited quotas. The result is that we have on hand at Ellis Island and at Boston about 1,100 recently arrived immigrants in excess of quotas from "Other Asia," from Assyria, from Armenia, from Syria, and from other places. Practically all are dependents—wives, mothers, children, or orphans—coming to relatives who are amply able and who will give bond for them.

Mr. Chairman, I have worked might and main the last 10 days to prevent the deportation under our 3 per cent law of minor orphan children, of mothers—worked to prevent the deportation of people who have come to the United States, some of them starting as long as a year ago, whereas our 3 per cent act was not passed until last May; people who have fallen sick on their way out of Assyria or some country like that and have been lying in hospitals in India, ill with fever or other disease for six or eight months, with the necessary visé on their passports—for which Uncle Sam has $10 in each case—that brought them a year late into the United States, at Ellis Island; only to be told that they are too late. All told, 1,100 such souls are lying at congested Ellis Island at this Christmas time waiting for the mercy of the United States.

Some of those people who are to be returned, under a strict reading of the law, must be returned to the stricken regions in Asia Minor where constant war rages between the bolshevik on the north and the followers of Mohammed on the south, who preach death on the edge of the sword of Islam; and who kill Christian and Jew alike; and so help me God, I will not stand idly by and let the United States send back these people if we can save them. [Applause.]

We are here to-day in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I am glad we can have these close-in, heart-to-heart talks. Congress would be better, in my opinion, with more such days of free debate. I contend that we are right as a nation, a Christian nation, a great humanitarian nation, in letting in 3,000 or 4,000 or 5,000 who come to our gates under misunderstandings, for which we are in part to blame; a few for each ship, under long stress of travel, to let them in under bond until we can find a way to take care of them.

There is a provision in the Burnett immigration law which gives the Secretary of Labor the power to exercise that right in individual cases. And that great, big hearted humanitarian, Secretary Davis, will exercise that right, if I am not mistaken, and will be applauded by the people for so doing. [Applause.]

The human heart acts about the same in every man. I have advocated a law for the admission of close blood relations of citizens and certain others. The reason I urge that is that we are about 25 years too late to do to-day that which we see now we should have done. What do I mean, you ask? Ah, gentlemen, if it were your mother or my mother lying there on Christmas night at Ellis Island, due to be deported, hopeless and crying for you, her son, who has made good, what would we do? What would any man do?

Oh, we can not admit all, but we can limit immigration to the immediate blood relatives. We can not do otherwise, in my opinion. The United States can not take care of all the world. All the people who would come can not come here. Would to God that we might still be the asylum for all the distressed and oppressed of the world. We must have restrictions. But where is the official who will send back the little orphaned children to Armenia, to Turkey, or to Assyria?

My colleagues, can not you see that our committee, the Committee on Immigration, has the problem of the human heart of the world on its hands? We are trying to find what is best for the United States. I think we know that permanent restriction is best. But people want haste. People cry out, "Suspend all immigration; stop it all!" Ah, they forget about travelers, they forget about visitors, and they forget about students. People see undesirable aliens here and cry out, "Deport them!" As if the United States had millions and millions of money to spend in sending shiploads of deportees and was able to send out all undesirable, and as if we had no treaties. You can not send some anarchist alien who came from some country away off in the east of Europe, but who came here from England, back to England and do it without the protest of England.

I ask you, Members of Congress and all members of the great Committee of the Whole, to look at all the phases of the complex problem.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Is it not a fact that the United States is now spending large amounts to deport people who have come from abroad?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and we have thousands of people coming in surreptitiously over the northern border and across the Texas border. We must tighten up those walls; we must provide penalties for steamship violations of the law, but to-day will we let dependent people whose relatives here send money—thousands of dollars monthly—over there across the water; will we send them back without trial when through no fault of ours they have been landed here, and when the same relatives stand ready to give bond for their support here and their good behavior, and who will spend the money here that they are now sending away? We speak of the admissions as temporary, but I presume they will be permanent. But what does 1,500 now under bond, and 1,100 at Ellis Island, amount to in numbers compared to the several hundred thousand that our 3 per cent law has not let even start?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I presume that the same difficulties with regard to violation of the immigration law would have occurred even if we did not have the 3 per cent restriction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. To a considerable extent.

Mr. TOWNER. So that it is not particularly because of the 3 per cent law as such that these undesirables or these people who are not entitled to come in under any circumstances are here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; the gentleman is quite right. But remember we are trying a brand-new law, the 3 per cent law, a brand-new plan, and in the mishaps and confusions of that law we have let in to date for humanity sake only a few thousand. What is that number compared to the thousands that the Government let in over the Mexican border after the war under bond to work at labor in the fields, a state of peonage, if you please? Is not the human heart big enough to see the difference? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington have one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be ungracious at all. I think we have used about one-fifth of the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can finish in one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. TOWNER. I just want to ask one question. In the law that is suggested by the gentleman is it intended to make complete exclusion except as to relatives?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are trying to make it so; yes. Now, one thing more, and I am through. The way to punish the steamship companies is not to fine them $100 for this or that violation, but to give the Secretary of Labor the right to refuse to land any immigrants from any country that willfully violates the law in any degree. That will cure that excess-quota problem.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there any practical way by which the embarkation of these unfortunate people on the other side can be prevented?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; if their countries will let us embody it in a treaty and if we are willing to have our people examined if they are going abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for nearly half a century some of the best people of the United States have endeavored with all their might and main to free this Government from the liquor traffic. They have freed it from the liquor traffic by the fundamental law of the land. Even though we now have bootleggers in the various States of the Union, even though we have illicit stills in various counties and States, yet the fact remains that there is a ban upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors throughout this land, and it is a ban that is going to stay, because it is in the Constitution. Yet I am sorry to say that the press of the country reports—whether truly or not I do not know—that the chairman of our great Ways and Means Committee has given out to the public the statement that shortly after the Christmas recess he and his committee are to consider seriously the advisability of attempting to disregard the constitutional law of our land and to recognize as a legitimate business of the country the manufacture and sale of certain kinds of liquors containing a certain per cent of alcohol, and that their excuse for so doing is that they will thereby raise a tax to pay a debt that this Government owes to the ex-service men of our country. I want to say that such an excuse is an insult to the soldiery of our land. It is an insult to the American soldier and the American sailor, who through great sacrifice were able to bring a world victory back from France. I want to say that they stand for the very highest that there is in morality in this Nation. I want to say that they do not want a bonus as badly as that; that they are not put to that great extreme where they would want this Congress to attempt to disregard the fundamental law of the land in order to pay its debts. Surely there can be found a legitimate means whereby this Nation can pay what is due to the ex-service men of our country without recognizing an unlawful traffic, a traffic that has been made unlawful by the fundamental law of our land. I want to say that this promise which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has made that he will take up this matter shortly after the new year presents a serious question. It is a proposition that the people of this country are not going to stand for, if the chairman of that committee or his committee attempt to override the Constitution. It is a question concerning which this Congress is going to hear from the people of this Nation from Seattle to Florida and from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic. The voice of the people on this question is going to be overwhelming. There is a proper way whereby the Constitution can be changed, and only that is the way that those who would seek to change it should go about to bring that procedure into effect.

If a majority of the people of this country want to exempt light wines and beer from the provision of the Constitution there is a constitutional way whereby they can do it. They can let Congress submit the question to the people of the United States, and they can let the legislatures of the country pass upon it. I want to say that whenever the Congress attempts to pursue the legal method there will be no change in the Constitution. The thinking people of this land, the men and women of America who have the best interests of our homes and firesides at heart, know that there has been a great achievement made by Congress and the legislatures of the States when they enacted the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. They are not going to stand for its being set aside by any such attempt or subterfuge, or any such excuse. I felt impelled by the recent press reports to say these few words on this subject.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we have had a more or less interesting discussion this afternoon of matters grave and gay and serious and fanciful. The more recent discussion has from my viewpoint been largely of matters in the realm of fancy and imagination. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] discussed earnestly or facetiously—I am not sure just what his thought was about the matter—a curious suggestion of legislation which blew into the legislative hopper yesterday touching blocs. Not being a French scholar I never quite understood what a bloc was. A distinguished engineer, who constructed one of the greatest engineering works in the world, once referred to a board as something that was very long, very narrow, very wooden. Of course, one could not apply that description to a block, except the latter part of it—a block is also wooden.

Passing from the manner of blocs, a thing wholly nonexistent in this House, although it is said by some to exist elsewhere, there was some little discussion of a suggestion that we raise the cash for a soldiers' bonus by toleration of and a tax on beer and wine. This is the holiday season, in which some men's minds naturally turn to beverages that are said to cheer, and far be it from me to deprive any gentleman of any imagining that may be pleasing or comforting to him. Of course, we all understand that so far as any legislation, early or remote, by this Congress along the line suggested is as improbable as the passage of the bloc bill. [Laughter and applause.] My own opinion is that it is not only impossible as a matter of legislation, but it is altogether improbable as a matter of serious consideration in any body belonging to or appertaining to this House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was about to suggest that it seemed to me that remarks of that character ought to be made when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] is present, and I do not see him. I wondered if the gentleman would not defer those remarks until a later time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman suggests deferring further remarks and not withdrawing those already made. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman will have his right to speak later, when the gentleman from Maryland is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to yield to some Member?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would be glad to.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that it is not the gentleman from Maryland who gives out the report; it is the chairman of the great Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, the gentleman from Michigan, who gives out the report that he is going to give due consideration to such a matter after the Christmas holidays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Michigan is also absent.

Mr. MANN. Has not the gentleman from Texas already given due consideration to it?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; long ago.

Mr. MANN. Then why does the gentleman object to somebody else considering it?

Mr. BLANTON. Because the conclusions are not so definite.

Mr. MANN. They will be.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. The gentleman from New York does not seem to be present, and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to address the House as a whole, but I want to say a few words confidentially to my Democratic colleagues. The Republican Members need not listen unless they wish to. I regret that there is not a larger Democratic membership present, but there are as many Democrats as Republicans. I do not say that critically, but I say it regretfully. I suggest to my Democratic colleagues that when they come back from the Christmas holidays they should realize that they have a responsibility and that it must be met. It is true that one of the great leaders on the Republican side a few weeks ago announced to us here on the floor that they did not need our help and did not want it. Of course he said that in a moment of anger at the Democratic side. He did not mean it. He recognized then what the country has since realized, that without the help of the Democrats in the House of Representatives the orderly processes of government will completely bog down. The Speaker realized it the other day and so did the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. You Democratic Members know that while I am a partisan I have always insisted that there are certain things which should not divide us in this House. One is that whenever a foreign question arises politics should cease at the water's edge. Another is that when partisan controversy is apt to prevent the necessary and proper legislation we ought to take the position that the party in power is responsible. I am a great believer in party responsibility.

I am very fond of the Speaker of the House and also of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and their cry of distress the other day touched my heart, and I made up my mind at that time that I was going to respond to it; I was not going to let their appeal be made in vain. Gentlemen will remember that the other day, in the midst of an effort by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to get a quorum here to do business, he cried out in the anguish of his soul, "Where are the 50 Democrats?" That was a confession that if just 50 Democrats were here public business could and would be attended to.

Then the Speaker of the House at one time in making a ruling on that same day said he thought the Democrats were trying to obstruct public business, because he saw only 10 Democrats on the floor. He failed to mention the fact that there were only the same number of Republicans. That was an admission upon his part that if we did not have more than 10 Democrats here the Government would just bog down under this so-called proficient, constructive Republican administration. The Republicans have a 2 to 1 majority, 303 Republicans, and yet even the Speaker and the Republican floor leader want as many as 50 Democrats to stay here absolutely so that the business of the Government will not come to a standstill because of the inefficiency of the Republican majority. I think there is something in their appeal, and I want to appeal to my fellow Democrats to come back after the holidays and assume the responsibilities that are ours, because the complete breakdown of this Republican administration has not only been realized by the country but is realized with distress by the gentleman to whom I have referred, the distinguished Speaker of the House, and the distinguished Republican floor leader. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Something has been said here about a "bloc." The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says that he does not know what a "bloc" is. He said that he was not enough of a French scholar. That is surprising to me, because he and his party under his leadership have engaged in so many "French gestures" by way of what is vulgarly called "bull-con" legislation that I thought he really was acquainted with French. If he really wants to know what a "bloc" is, he might ask Secretary Weeks. He told him. It will be remembered that our Republican friends were very much elated when they took charge under this administration. The real leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]—because the man who holds the purse strings is really the leader, and gentlemen here will live to see the day when the man who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will give orders to the President and to the Speaker under your present system of appropriations—the real leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in his elation announced, before these gentlemen succeeded in forming an agricultural bloc in an effort to insist not upon special legislation for agriculture but for equality of treatment and for proper consideration of the problems that disturb the great agricultural sections of the West—the real leader [Mr. MADDEN] announced with a good deal of dictum and with that vehemence that he can assume at times that for the first time since the Civil War, I believe he said, the people who paid the taxes, who lived north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, were in control of the Government and that they were going to run it. Right then and there the "agricultural bloc" was formed, because that was notice that if men who believed in nonpartisan legislation for the benefit of the agricultural interests of this country did not get together the only legislation that would be enacted under this administration would be typical Republican legislation, which is class legislation for the benefit of the great financial and manufacturing interests of the country.

If there be a bona fide desire upon the part of men who represent agriculture in the South and West, regardless of party lines, to see to it that the farmers of the country are given not class legislation but equality of treatment, for that is all we ask, and they are getting together, prompted by the same common interest in the same common patriotism, and their getting together constitutes the forming of an "agricultural bloc," then the gentleman from Wyoming has one under his wing, just as they have at the other end of the Capitol.

I am a little bit alarmed, I would say to my Democratic friends, as to whether or not there will be legislation purely along that line, because I know the call of party. I know our friends on the Republican side of the aisle are facing a very serious proposition. They must make up their minds just whether they will follow Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, or Secretary of War Weeks. They have to make up their minds whether they will come in with their party in following a program that has marked every step that the Republican Party ever took and confine their legislation to class legislation and the benefit of one class and of one section, that is the manufacturing interests of the North and East, or whether they will oppose that class, now in control of legislation, and insist that the great Republican States and constituencies representing the agricultural people who sent them here shall be considered and have their problems solved as far as possible by legislation by this Congress.

That is a difficult situation, because a congressional election is coming on. My prediction is that a great majority will be whipped into line.

Mr. BARKLEY. On which side?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I am talking about the Republican side. That is the only side that is in trouble.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman does not understand me. On which side of the agricultural question will they be whipped into line?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, they will be whipped into line on the side of the Republican organization, which is controlled by the northern and eastern interests named, the same group which put our genial, good-natured, handsome President in the White House. Our friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is just imitating the President when he says he is not "very clear." That was a candid confession on his part. Gentlemen will have noticed that his favorite expression of late has been, "I do not know just exactly what the gentleman is driving at; that is not very clear." In other words, he tries to keep himself in the state of mind that evidently the distinguished President is in, when he confessed to the whole country, in spite of propaganda being put out that he is the guiding intellect of the disarmament conference, that he is consulted each morning on the day's doings, that, as a matter of fact, he did not really know what was going on, and did not know the real agreement nor the real consideration that moved the delegates in forming the quadruple alliance between the United States, England, Japan, and France.

And I am not going to discuss who is right or wrong, because I said, and I stand by it, in all seriousness, when in the efforts of President Harding and this administration they try to reach any kind of an agreement that will insure peace and stabilize the economic conditions of the world, I was ready to stand behind them, and I regret that the President of the United States did not wait and see what the conference had done, and not come out in the press and contradict the great Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, for whom I have a great admiration. My friend from Wyoming is getting in the same state of mind. I suggest that before he states the Republican program he consult the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Baltimore [Mr. HILL]. Both of them are very prominent members of the Republican organization. I have understood they are very influential members. I have always been under the impression that those two men had more influence, outside the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], than anybody else on the Republican side, except, of course, our genial monitor, Mr. MANN, who has come out of his garden and has seen fit again to meet with us and aid the deliberations of this body.

Mr. PARRISH. Is the gentleman aware also that Secretary of the Treasury Mellon seriously considered the proposition of resigning?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I feel sorry for Mr. Mellon. He formerly lived so excluded that you had to take an elevator and ascend about 50 yards and go through several "flunkies" to make an engagement to see him some time next session. So he was exasperated when he was called down to the Capitol. He thinks there are a lot of pestiferous Members of the House, who send for him to make him tell about the public business, and feels that his privacy is being violated. So we had to give him an Undersecretary of the Treasury to attend to the duties, because the pestiferous representatives of the people wanted him to tell what was going on. He does not know whether to retire or not. He does not have to retire, because he heads the financial group that elected this administration, but he may retire and put one of his underlings in his place. By the way, I am wondering what is to become of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. We all remember he brought in a report here from one of those war smelling committees. I was wondering what became of that. It condemned a company of Mr. Mellon's.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield me more time, because the gentleman from Massachusetts is sending up distress signals, and I want to find out what the trouble is? He seems to be trying to remind the Chairman my time has expired. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes additional?

I see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is spreading his angelic wings. May I inquire if he wants to interrupt me?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WINGO. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. WALSH. I notice the gentleman turns to the majority side of the Chamber. Is he now about to devote the same proportion of his remarks to the majority side as he has devoted to the minority side of the Chamber?

Mr. WINGO. I am not going to address my remarks to the Republican majority. I am a practical man, one who has been educated in the hard school of experience, and have a wholesome respect for the scriptural injunction, "Give not the holy things unto the dogs, nor cast thy pearls before swine, lest they turn again and rend thee." For that reason I shall not presume to offer any suggestions to the 303 Republicans, who are absolutely unable not only to attend to public business but even to maintain a quorum. As a group, I give them up as utterly hopeless. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was discussing, I believe, Brother Mellon, of the Treasury. [Laughter.] I really ought to give some advice to the gentleman from Massachusetts about Barnstable. Is Barnstable, Mass., in the gentleman's district?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I am asking the gentleman a question. I have yielded to him.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it is on Cape Cod, in the midst of the cranberry section.

Mr. WINGO. Nobody ever accused the gentleman from Massachusetts of being a cranberry statesman simply because he is small. [Laughter.] He is really a very able statesman, and I am very fond of him, because most of the faults I have he has and a few of my virtues, and thus there is a bond of sympathy between us. He is about as sweet tempered as I am.

Mr. WALSH. I am sorry the gentleman would seek to condemn me in terms so severe as that. I do not know but what I might be justified in demanding that the gentleman's words be taken down, considering all the faults that the gentleman has. [Laughter.] I doubt if I ought to allow that statement of his to go out to the country unchallenged at this joyous season of the year. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. I will state for the benefit of Members who were not here a few years ago that the gentleman from Massachusetts is a real Indian and never forgets. The gentleman got very angry with me once because facetiously I threatened to have certain words of his taken down. He had said that I did not have any more sense than he had. [Laughter.] Upon reflection, I concluded that he had intended it as a compliment to me, because he has great sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And where does the gentleman from Washington get off?

Mr. WINGO. I am glad to say that the gentleman from Washington is trying as hard as he can to solve the problem of immigration. If he can get a change of policy in an administration that will permit one who was a spy in the last war to come back to the United States and engage in business and then deny the right of admission to the alien members of the family of an alien-born ex-service man who showed his loyalty to the country of his adoption by offering to sacrifice his life in its defense on the battle line, he will be doing a good work. Those relatives of the alien-born service man are barred out, although they came in on the same boat on the same day as the former spy. If he can show the gentlemen responsible for that just where they get off, he will earn further the gratitude of this House and of the country in his efforts to solve the immigration problem.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman ought to know that most of us would not only favor sending that spy back but all others under like circumstances.

Mr. WINGO. I am sure of that. I am sure the gentleman from Washington would favor the release of ex-service men who happened to commit petty offenses during the war who are now in prison, and I am sure, if the gentleman had his way about it, those boys would be permitted to go back home, now that the war is over, instead of still being confined, especially when the man at the other end of the Avenue, acting under the counsel of the Attorney General, proposes to pardon the so-called political prisoners like Debs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the gentleman will find that if any alien prisoners are released, they will be sent to the country from whence they came.

Mr. WINGO. I believe that when you go out for political purposes and pander to the lawless element of this country and turn out of prisons men who were disloyal in their utterances and in their influence and still keep imprisoned men of simple minds who were affected by those disloyal utterances and who may not have known what was technically meant, when judged by legal standards, you are doing an unjust and inequitable thing. Those boys are in prison and I think somebody ought to get them out.

I know of one such boy whose sole offense was that he wanted to go and see his sick mother; the exasperated Army officer would not give him a furlough and he just went home. Everybody knew where he was going. He told his friends and his comrades that he was going home to see his sick mother. He was apprehended and sent to prison, and he and some older men broke out, and they tried him for escaping, and he is now lying in prison.

I say, send home the boys like that. They are the men who really have to pay the penalty for the disloyal utterances of other men who, though their utterances may not have been disloyal technically, were yet the cause of thoughtless boys getting into trouble on account of the construction given to their words. My heart goes out to those boys, and not to these so-called political offenders. My heart goes out to those boys who are incarcerated now, and whose families can not understand why those boys are still held, simply because they committed some petty offense in the Army. Some officer got a little brutal with them, and they, full of that great initiative and pride which constitutes the real strength of the American soldier, committed some breach of rule or regulation and in consequence were court-martialed and imprisoned. They are languishing now in prison. I would turn those boys out on Christmas Day, and if that were done it would do far more to revive the spirit of loyalty to this Government than would the letting out of any of the so-called political leaders and political prisoners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why did not the gentleman go down to the recent meeting of the proponents of personal liberty in the United States, addressed by the Deputy Commissioner of Labor, Louis F. Post, and make an appeal?

Mr. WINGO. Those men I hope are not running the administration. I hope that no President, whether he be a Democrat or Republican, will ever let that bunch control his action. [Applause.] If you are going to release Debs and the other leaders, you have no right to longer hold in prison the soldier boys who are still confined in prison. For them I plead. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we feel that all the arguments that have been made on that side have been answered by gentlemen on this side. [Laughter.] We have more time remaining to our credit. Does the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] care to recess?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we would like to use about five minutes more on this side if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] desires.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, we may have to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in order to lift the load of gloom and disappointment that has been cast upon the Republican Party by the eloquent gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and in order to stifle the sighs now swelling in our bosoms, I call upon Brother YOUNG of North Dakota for his experience. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the following title:

H. R. 9464. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] two minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am rather astonished at the two minutes yielded to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He is a member of the Judiciary Committee, and I asked him to allow me to call the attention of the membership of the committee to a question that was brought up in the House in the last Congress on the matter of providing for the contingency that might arise over the disability of the President to perform the duties of his office. Of course, that can not be discussed in two minutes. I took an hour before the Committee on the Judiciary in which to present it, and have had the compliment of letters from a great number of editors throughout the country asking me why I do not push some legislation upon that subject at the present moment, in which they state their opinion that I had made a good case before the committee.

I will not attempt to state before this committee or any other body of legislators in two minutes why I think this particular omission in the Constitution ought to be supplied by an amendment or, if it should appear that we already have the constitutional authority, then by legislation. Some of our greatest constitutional lawyers, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], hold that we can do this without an amendment to the Constitution. Other members of the Judiciary Committee, including its chairman, Mr. VOLSTEAD, hold the same opinion. Whether it can be done without constitutional amendment or whether it requires such an amendment, I think the whole country agrees that this omission ought to be supplied. Believing, as I do, that it requires an amendment, I offered in the last Congress the following proposal:

Said disability to be determined by the Supreme Court when authorized by concurrent resolution of Congress. The Vice President is authorized to call Congress into special session for this purpose upon recommendation of the Cabinet.

This is not the only omission touching the Executive office. I wonder whether Members of the House are aware that there is the possibility of an interregnum in the Presidency of the United States that needs no change in the Constitution, but looks simply to legislation, but which thus far has been omitted. For example, if both the President and Vice President elect should die after the Electoral College had voted and the count was made here in the House, the best authority in America says there is no provision either in the Constitution or under the law to fill that interregnum. We need only a law authorizing the reconvening of the Electoral College for the purpose of making a selection, the college having ceased when the vote is once counted. Why we allow an omission of such necessary legislation to remedy it seems to me difficult to understand. However, that is not the question I rose to discuss. I merely mention it as an example of our willingness to trust to luck in such important matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. I am very much obliged to the floor leader. The force of the Constitution touching the question of vacancies in the Executive Office is as follows:

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President.

That has occurred in our history five times. It first occurred in the time of Tyler, then of Fillmore, then of Johnson, then of Arthur, and lastly of Roosevelt. I am mentioning the Vice Presidents who succeeded to office instead of the Presidents who died. There is no dispute here, except whether the Vice President becomes Acting President or the President. It was decided President instead of Acting President.

The Constitution further provides:

And the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

You will note by a plain wording of the Constitution that it covers only the cases where both President and Vice President are incapacitated, and gives authority to the Congress to fill the vacancy. We had the law of 1792 to cover this situation, and which provided that if the President and Vice President both died or a vacancy occurred because of removal or otherwise, the President pro tempore of the Senate would act as President. If he should die or be removed or resign, then the Speaker of the House should take the office. This stood as the law until 1886, but was never employed. Then, in 1886 that was changed, omitting the President pro tempore of the Senate, also the Speaker of the House, and substituting the members of the Cabinet successively, beginning with the Secretary of State. But this does not apply in the case of the disability of the President to perform his duties. There is no provision in the Constitution giving power to Congress to provide for filling the office if the inability of the President to perform his duties should occur. Neither is there, as I see it, any authority anywhere to define the disability. There is no provision in the Constitution that I see for either defining disability or providing for it when defined and established. When President Garfield was lying at the point of death for months, although it was known his condition incapacitated him to function as the head of the Nation, under the law as it stands he was the President. I think it is generally conceded, and this can be said with no discredit to his greatness, that he was not in mental or physical condition to execute the law, but nevertheless he was still the President and no one could act for him. The situation at the time was so delicate that for explanation of the terms, I might say, there was no public discussion of his disability.

"Inability" is the term used in the Constitution which refers to the matter to be established by proof, and "disability" is the term used in the same paragraph to refer to the matter when once it is established by proof. Before his death, and during the weeks of suspense, there was no discussion of President Garfield's disability to perform the duties of his office; but as soon as the end came general discussion of the subject was taken up in the House. Among the number were five of the greatest thinkers of our country. One was Senator Trumbull of Illinois, who discussed the constitutional question from the standpoint of a legislator and constitutional lawyer. Another was Benjamin Butler, of Massachusetts, once chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, but later Governor of Massachusetts. He discussed it as the governor, from the executive point of view. Another was Senator Morgan of Alabama, who also viewed it from the angle of the legislator. Still another was Thomas M. Cooley, a noted professor of law in the University of Michigan, who discussed it from the broad, general point of constitutional law and the science of politics. The other was President Timothy Dwight of Yale, a distinguished scholar, highly versed in international law. All of these people raised the question whether there is any sanction in the Constitution for making provision for this disability. These trained minds did not agree on the constitutional status. Some claimed that the Congress can do it. Cooley took this view. Others held that the Congress has no power to do it and it would require the Constitution amended.

The great scholar and political scientist, George Ticknor Curtis, than whom there is no greater authority, held there is no provision in the Constitution.

Since I presented these views in the last Congress articles frequently occur in the press discussing the subject. Only two weeks ago such an article appeared in one of the papers in the city, claiming that there is no need of a constitutional amendment, that Congress is free to act. Most of the argument is adduced from practices in foreign countries. Of course, this does not offer any light whatever on the subject at hand. Foreign countries are not limited by written instructions of an organic law. Their unwritten constitution has the force of law, and when an exigency arises they meet it. It is claimed that we would do likewise. I have no doubt we would, but it would not be a normal process, since our acts are limited within the written instructions of the Constitution.

This writer refers to the custom of regencies. True, but in the United States we have no regencies and no constitutional authority to create such. The author fails to note the force of a written instrument which governs the lawmaker in the extent of his authority. "Inclusio unius exclusio alterius" is the principle of constitutional interpretation as well as legal construction. We must look to the Constitution for any authority we contemplate using or exercising. It must either be expressed or clearly implied. No one will assert that the authority to define or fix the "disability" of the President is expressed in terms of the Constitution. I have not been able to find where it clearly implies the power. If the power exists it will be implied, but thus far no one has pointed out where the power is lodged to authorize Congress to act if the exigency arises. The undisputed fact that the exigency has arisen in our history, and no action was taken, and even no one yet has even indicated what and how any action could be taken, is sufficient at least to compel consideration of definite steps to meet such emergencies.

It has recently been stated in the press that Congress could pass a law creating a commission to consist of the Vice President, Speaker of the House, Chief Justice, and chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on the Judiciary with authority to define disability. I doubt that seriously. I wish simply to raise this question: In view of the wide divergence of opinion of the best minds of the country, I insist the matter must be made clear. It is so primarily important, in my mind, that when there can be no delicacy whatever in discussing it we should take it up and find a way to provide for the case of the disability of the President to perform the duties of the position and not run into the embarrassment that would come upon us in an interregnum at any time.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Has the gentleman inquired into the method or practice of Great Britain, so far as this matter is concerned?

Mr. FESS. They have the regency, so that this situation never can embarrass them.

Mr. LONDON. But how do they determine the disability of the ruler or sovereign?

Mr. FESS. I do not know the procedure.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that there is any way of determining the disability of the President unless he is wildly insane without almost stirring up the Government so that no business could be transacted?

Mr. FESS. Well, I presume it would be an occasion for stirring up the country, because there would be a dispute as to whether it is a disability, since no Executive would likely admit that his situation creates a disability.

Mr. MANN. If some method is provided by law, as suggested by the gentleman, is not the danger that it will be resorted to on many occasions when it ought not to be and which would be much graver than the danger from letting it alone?

Mr. FESS. I should not think that would occur. I do think, however, that it ought not to be left to the judgment of the Vice President as to whether it is a disability or not, because he is an interested party.

Mr. MANN. Andrew Johnson had articles of impeachment preferred against him when he was President. It was plain that he was frequently disabled, and it might have been a much simpler process to have gotten rid of him as President by that method than it was by the method which the Constitution provided for, namely, impeachment, which was not successful. With the partisan feeling then prevailing, is it not quite likely that if the method suggested by the gentleman had been provided an effort would have been made to use it and thereby cause civil war in the country again?

Mr. FESS. I think in the case of Johnson it was an extreme case. He was impeached because the articles of impeachment passed the House and only lacked one vote in the Senate. But that was an extreme case because of the bitterness that grew out of the Civil War. However, I am of opinion that had a provision of the sort I am advocating been in the law, the country would have been spared that spectacle. Now, I would say to my friend, whose judgment goes further with me than that of any other Member of the House on a question of this kind, that it seems to me we are leaving open a serious omission. I do not think it true that the remedy proposed is worse than the error we wish to correct.

Mr. MANN. Take the recent case of President Wilson. Everybody knew that President Wilson was not able to perform the duties as President for a time. We all knew it; the country knew it, and I presume that he knew it. There was a great deal of talk about Vice President Marshall assuming the duties of President. It seems to me, and did at the time, that it would have been extremely unfortunate for the country to have any declaration made that President Wilson was disabled and for Vice President Marshall to act as President or become President. I think it would have raised a row in the country that would have lasted for a long time.

Mr. FESS. Suppose there was a provision by which the Supreme Court, when directed by concurrent resolution of Congress, should declare the disability, or that a justice of the Supreme Court was to head a commission of which there would be a member from the Senate, one from the House, and one from the President's Cabinet, or a commission composed of the Vice President, Speaker of the House, Chief Justice, and chairmen of the Judiciary Committees could there be any possibility of an outbreak over a decision of that group?

Mr. MANN. If everybody was agreed on the proposition there would not be any trouble, but if it was a matter where there was a serious controversy involved, then there would be trouble. Who is the President? Who is the authority? He is at the head of the Army and the Navy. Who gives the directions? Then you ask an Army officer to determine whether he will obey an order from this man or that man, and you will get a double-headed effort at government.

Mr. FESS. In view of the importance of these questions you ask who would command the Army and who would be the President? Should there be any doubt permitted as to what constitutes disability to issue Executive orders? Is is not incredible that our Government has left open such an omission as that? I do not know of any other Government that has not provided for it.

Mr. MANN. We have provided that if the President is unable to discharge his duties the Vice President shall act.

Mr. FESS. The Constitution provides who shall act when a vacancy occurs by death, removal, or resignation, and when both of them are unable to perform the duties for some reason, Congress has the power to provide succession, which it has already done, but no provision for "disability."

Mr. MANN. We have provided for a succession as far as that is concerned. The difficulty is in determining the fact of disability.

Mr. FESS. That is correct, and is the point in issue. We provide that if the office of President is vacated either by removal or resignation or death of the President, it is filled by the Vice President, but we do not provide for anything else. The Constitution limits it to these three causes of vacancies. What if he is disabled? Who is to say that he is disabled? There is no vacancy until some power declares the disability. Where is that power? That is what I want to know.

Mr. MANN. I say that is it. It is a question of fact. If he does not admit it, and you determine, then you are in a row.

Mr. FESS. Then it is a fact that we confess that we are impotent to remove. In other words, we have a situation that we know to be serious but are impotent to correct, since the correction would be more dangerous that the fact.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we do not confess that. If the case ever arises where the Government would cease to function for lack of a President the gentleman will find that it will be determined very quickly by the Congress.

Mr. FESS. I agree that would be done, but that would be revolution.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it would not.

Mr. FESS. It would be peaceful revolution.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. Congress would declare that the President was disabled and provide for a successor. It would be done with unanimity.

Mr. FESS. Assuming Congress would, as I do not doubt it would, I ask where is the authority for Congress to do it? Is not that revolution?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is revolution.

Mr. FESS. I do not mean an overturn of the Government, but I mean using authority that we do not have.

Mr. MANN. I think Congress would have just as much authority to determine that the President was disabled as it would to appoint a commission to determine that he was disabled.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman on that point. But I deny that Congress has the power to appoint the commission. That is why I contend that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the discussion has brought out what I wanted to bring out. I am really serious in my contention in this matter. It has created a very wide interest throughout the country, as shown by the editorial comment and opinion of scholarly men interested in the subject. I believe we ought to take some action and not leave this thing in its present state. If it can be done without an amendment, let it be done. If not, then the Constitution should be so amended. This would be, in my judgment, the time to do it. Then there could be no reflection upon anybody. If we delay until occasion enforces the attention of the country upon the wisdom of such action, it will be embarrassing. The action if taken now would not be centered toward anybody, and no one would be criticized for attempting to correct an obvious omission, either of constitutional sanction which must be corrected by amendment or legal enactment, which could be supplied by Congress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman, after some lengthy examination, the view that he takes is that if the President should become violently or permanently insane, there is no authority in the Constitution for taking any action?

Mr. FESS. That is precisely my contention. There is no authority in law, and so far as I can see there is absolutely no authority in the Constitution to provide for it. I think I am right about it. At any rate, whatever be the proper procedure, it ought not to be longer delayed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] to discuss a nonpartisan matter. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I welcome this hilarious, almost boisterous, but somewhat tardy recognition. If I had not been reelected to Congress, I might never have known of the high appreciation which this vociferous applause indicates. I take it, however, that it is not altogether on account of my personal appearance. I have at least a very deep suspicion that that is not the cause. For going back in history as far as the American Revolution, I find that my great-grandfather was a soldier having the rank of captain. I take some credit incidentally for achieving the liberties of the people in having furnished them with my great-grandfather. [Applause and laughter.] Mr. Chairman, it is a tradition in our family that Capt. Tom White was the homeliest man in the Continental Army. It is even said that whenever Washington would look at him he would become so angry that he would want to go out and lick the British. I do not know that that is true. I can not tell, for I never saw my great-grandfather. However, my own father, who was his oldest grandson, saw him many times, and once, with what I thought was a look of sadness on his face, he said to me, "HAYS, you look just exactly like your great-grandfather." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] upon the subject of prohibition. I allow no man to be a stronger prohibitionist than myself. I was also somewhat interested in the references to the bloc, and I thought when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] had delivered his able utterance on that subject he had produced something tangible—a block and tackle. As I say, I am interested in prohibition and I am a prohibitionist. I come from a State which was among the first to adopt prohibition. I voted for it. Subsequently I became a member of the legislature in the lower branch, when bills were introduced to amend and strengthen the law, and in the senate of the State of Kansas I had the same experience and gave to those measures my best support.

I was a tax commissioner for the State of Kansas when one of its present distinguished Senators from Kansas was governor of that State, and when he recommended and there was introduced and passed a bill known generally as the William D. Bone or Bone dry bill.

At that time there was in that State a man of great genius and skill in locating blind tigers. He had the most stupendous nose that I ever saw attached to a human physiognomy, and also the most highly illuminated. [Laughter.] His hair swayed in the breezes of Kansas like the top layer of a hayrick in a cyclone. I saw this man first at the State fair, and he gave a free exhibition. I was stopping in Topeka temporarily, although my home was not there, but my duties kept me almost constantly in the capital of the State. Some of my neighbors came down from that great county of Jewel to see the fine cattle, the fine swine, the sheep, and all those things which we exhibited in such superlative quality. One of those neighbors was a man of Herculanean frame, but with a voice as gentle as that of a school child. After we had looked at all of those things on exhibition he saw this man with the stupendous proboscis. As I say, he was giving a free exhibition, and his nose was one of the great attractions at the fair. My friend looked at him a moment and then turned to me and said, "HAYS, is that natural or artificial?" Mr. Chairman, the nose was natural but the illumination was artificial. [Laughter.] I never saw that man but once after that time. I never saw his nose but once after that time. Then I could see only a part of it, because he had his back to me, and I could see only about 3 inches of the nose, although the illumination was brilliantly in evidence. [Laughter.]

I was going from my home to my office in the State House. I said this would be a nonpartisan speech, but I know my Democratic friends will pardon me when I say that in conformity with our law we have to have a Democrat on the State tax commission, and it was a stormy night, and as I left the car I saw my friend of the highly illuminated nose leaving the car and I went up to my office and saw there my Democratic colleague.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I can not yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield three additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will yield.

Mr. PARRISH. Does the gentleman mind telling us whether his friend was a Democrat or a Republican and then we will know whether the speech is nonpartisan.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Well, I think the gentleman will understand as I proceed. I was going to say, and I may explain to you for the satisfaction of my friend and colleague from Texas—in conformity with the law, as I said, it was necessary to have one Democrat on the State tax commission. The night was stormy. I went in and there sat the so-called Democrat. After sitting there an hour or two I submit that anybody would feel desperate who had to sit in a room with a Democrat for several hours in solitary confinement, and so thinking of this nose, having been dubbed the "short-haired poet" of this House or the "poet lariat," being a stockman, I perpetrated this villainy which I now submit to you:

Why should a man of common size
Disport a nose of monstrous mien,
Containing all the various dyes
That formulate the aniline?

This man's a menace to the night
When he walks down the city streets;
His nose shines like a beacon light,
Confusing everyone he meets.

Sometimes a dim and murky fog
Doth dim the common traveler's way,
But offers to this man no clog—
His nose shines like the orb of day.

I will not tell you this man's name;
To do so would provoke his wrath;
I have no heart to quench the flame
That kindles up his mortal path.

No other nose that I have seen,
No other man I ever knew,
Could thus dispense with gasoline
And safely plow the darkness through.

The man who wears this gorgeous nose
In my rude barn should he aspire
In weariness to seek repose,
His nose would set the hay on fire.

[Applause.]

Good-by, Old Top, go wend thy way;
No goblins shall thy soul affright—
Thou art wasting light by day;
Thy glim is shining every night.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the program has now progressed far enough so that we know precisely what ought to be done, and I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that we stand in recess for five minutes. I think we can stand in recess in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not feel he would be justified in recognizing such a request under the rule.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the committee rose.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the President's message, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for five minutes. Mr. Speaker, we are waiting for a bill from the Senate and I think that bill will be here in five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] may speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee and the Members of the House in allowing me this time. I wish to use it in paying a humble though sincere tribute to the life and memory of a distinguished Kentuckian and a great American, of whose death we have all just learned. I refer to Col. Henry Watterson, whose name is a household word in every Kentucky home, and is almost a household word in every American home.

I dare say there is no journalist now living—and few, if any, who are dead—who have exercised a greater influence upon the intellectual and political life of this Nation than Col. Henry Watterson. He was the last of what we know as the old school of journalists.

His activities in the field of journalism date back for more than half a century. But he was more than a journalist. He was a philosopher, a historian, a statesman. In the power of vision and prophecy, in the power to express his convictions in picturesque and romantic language, in the courage to espouse every cause in which he believed, regardless of consequences to himself, he had few equals and no superiors.

He was a man of the broadest and deepest education. He possessed a profound knowledge of mankind, and knew how to point to it for the guidance of his fellow man. He was a patriot of the purest type and devoted his life to the service of his country. He enjoyed a popularity in the South, where he spent most of his life, and in the North, where he was almost equally well known, that no other journalist of recent history ever enjoyed. He exercised a profound influence upon the history of the United States during the past half century.

Personally, I did not always agree with his position on public matters. But even when I disagreed, I enjoyed the mental exercise which was always stimulated by the reading of his editorials and speeches. A great southerner, he was a sincere admirer of Lincoln and wrote speeches and books concerning his life. His imagination, his patriotism, his love of country, was limited by no sectional or geographical lines or boundaries.

When the life of this typical American, this great American, shall be written by the historian of the future it will glow upon the page like letters of gold, filling with pride all who knew him and all who followed him and all who have known of his career.

If I had the time I should like to review his interesting, romantic life, with its emotions, its enthusiasms, its grasp upon the problems of the human race and of our Republic. I can not do that now. I may attempt it at some future time.

But I could not let this opportunity pass to pay a feeble tribute to one who has added luster to the name of Kentucky and whose name will be long remembered by the people of that great Commonwealth, regardless of political or religious creed. He belongs with the Greeleys, the Danas, the Prentices, the Medills. He enriched the language which he spoke, the literature which he read, the history which he helped to make, and the Nation which he loved and served. Let us hope and believe, as we do, that he has passed over the river and rests in the shade of the trees. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I just learned of the death of Henry Watterson. I think I never met him personally. When I was a young man—I am still one of "the boys"—there were a number of very distinguished newspaper editors. It seems to me at times now that perhaps we do not have the same character of editors that we used to have, but I suppose that is because they are younger, and as they grow older and their fame becomes greater their reputation will extend. Of course I can remember back to the day when Horace Greeley was an editor. Henry Watterson was of a class, I think, perhaps of the same class that Joseph Medill, of Chicago, editor of the Chicago Tribune, belonged to. I knew him better. There was a very small number of editors in the United States who had the influence of men like Horace Greeley or Joseph Medill or Henry Watterson, an influence far beyond their own papers. They were brainy men, who, I think, never allowed the counting room of the newspaper to determine in any way whatever the editorial or news policy of the paper.

I can call to mind to-day no one who stands quite in the same position that these held in the public estimation. But perhaps there are a number—I am very sure there are some—of exceedingly bright men connected with the newspapers to-day. Of course we are prone in this body to think that the great men are all dead. The public very often gets the impression that the great men were in the past. Yet I think I can recognize in this House, even among some of the very younger Members of the House, great statesmen if they are permitted to come long enough to show their ability.

Men like Henry Watterson had nerve. He was never a coward. He was never afraid to express his belief, which did not always coincide with the wishes of his readers. He was often criticized by his readers, who threatened to withdraw their support from the paper. We are often criticized by constituents, who threaten to withdraw their support from us. It always amuses me when I get such criticism, which is not infrequent. It never made any difference to Henry Watterson, and I think if we could all learn that people who thus criticize us usually do it in a moment of passion and think less of us if we pay any attention to it we would do well.

Meanwhile, remembering Henry Watterson, I hope you will all have a very pleasant time during the holidays. [Applause.]

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I judged from the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that the House would take a recess without taking action with reference to the President's annual message. I notice from the rule that the President's message is usually referred to the Union Calendar, and it is distributed by resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It seems to me that this action of referring the different subjects in the message should be taken now, because the standing committees are at work. I inquire whether this action of distributing the message by resolution from the Committee on Ways and Means will be taken now, or at the beginning of the session after the holiday recess?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will not the gentleman permit us to remain in ignorance about that subject a little longer? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEENERSON. No. I think there are several committees that desire to have action taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that used to be the practice, but the Chair is not aware that it has been done for some years.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know it was not done during the last administration—for eight years—but prior to that it was done.

The SPEAKER. Apparently there is no one present representing the Committee on Ways and Means who could do it now.

Mr. STEENERSON. Would it not be in order when the House convenes again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. STEENERSON. So that the standing committees can get jurisdiction then.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no further business.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the minority, which has not the power to be constructive, and which sometimes is charged with being obstructive but which has never yet been charged with being destructive, I desire to express the best of good wishes to the highest authority of this House, the Speaker of the House. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair appreciates deeply the kind wish expressed by the gentleman. It is but a continuance of the kindness which he, as leader of the minority, has displayed toward the Chair throughout the session. In fact, the Chair feels under obligation to all Members on both sides of the House for their consideration and forbearance, and wishes you all a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Commitee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9548. An act for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia;

H. R. 9464. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash.; and

H. J. Res. 233. Joint resolution providing for the postponement of the World's Dairy Congress.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2790. An act to authorize the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., to construct a bridge across the Escambia River at or near Century, Fla.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the business immediately before the House having been disposed of, the time has come under the resolution recently adopted to move adjournment. I desire to express my appreciation of the good and faithful work of the Members on both sides, and to join with the Speaker in wishing all the Members of the House a very happy holiday season, and a prompt return to a very busy session, in what we hope will be a very prosperous New Year. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m) the House, under the resolution previously adopted, adjourned until Tuesday, January 3, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

435. A letter from the Acting Director of United States Veterans' Bureau, transmitting a request for certain changes on page 115 of the appropriation bill, regarding the allotments to the United States Public Health Service; to the Committee on Appropriations.

436. A letter from the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation for inclusion in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, under the appropriation for "Medical and hospital expenses of the United States Veterans' Bureau"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

437. A letter from the chairman of the War Finance Corporation, transmitting the fourth annual report (H. Doc. No. 143) of the War Finance Corporation for the year ending November 30, 1921; to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

438. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the annual inspection of the several branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, made by Lieut. Col. R. C. Humber, inspector general, and Majs. E. S. Miller, R. G. Peck, and A. D. Cummings, inspectors general; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HUDDLESTON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9386) to grant the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co., Goldsboro, N. C., to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River at or near Pireway Ferry, Columbus County, N. C., reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 541), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was dicharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9436) granting a pension to Joseph E. Quinn, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 9685) to prohibit the desecration or improper use of the flag, standard, colors, or ensign of the United States of America within the Territory of Porto Rico; to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9686) to investigate the claims of and to enroll certain persons, if entitled, with the Omaha Tribe of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CURRY: A bill (H. R. 9687) to provide for the consolidation or a redistribution of the powers and duties of certain executive departments of the Government of the United States relating to the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. HOGAN: A bill (H. R. 9688) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, to provide revenue therefor by a tax upon nonintoxicating beer, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WASON: A bill (H. R. 9689) for the establishment and maintenance of a forest experiment station on the White Mountain National Forest, in the State of New Hampshire; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 9690) to abrogate all Executive orders placing fourth-class postmasters in the classified service, and all Executive orders requiring competitive examination of applicants for first, second, and third class post offices; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. HILL: A bill (H. R. 9691) to create Federal local option districts, to provide money to pay adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, to amend the revenue act of 1921, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CABLE: A bill (H. R. 9692) to provide additional hospital facilities for persons who served in the World War, and making appropriations therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MUDD: A bill (H. R. 9693) making an appropriation for the improvement and repair of Central Avenue, in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9694) making an appropriation for the improvement and repair of Wahlers Hill and the lighting of Wheeler Road, in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. COLTON: A bill (H. R. 9695) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Ogden, in the State of Utah, and appropriating money therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BECK: A bill (H. R. 9696) granting a pension to Amanda A. Lewis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BIRD: A bill (H. R. 9697) granting a pension to Daniel Dye; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9698) granting a pension to Walter Hughes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 9699) granting a pension to Albert I. Young; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 9700) for the improvement of Locklies Creek, Va.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. KEARNS: A bill (H. R. 9701) granting a pension to Bert L. Ketchum; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 9702) for the relief of Mrs. George Keyser; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McPHERSON: A bill (H. R. 9703) granting an increase of pension to Wilhelmine Worm; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBSION: A bill (H. R. 9704) granting a pension to Lee T. Philpot; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. UPSHAW: A bill (H. R. 9705) to relieve the Georgia School of Technology, Atlanta, Ga., of financial responsibility and accountability for certain articles of Government property issued to that institution by the War Department for the conduct of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and which have been lost through theft; to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3377. By Mr. FROTHINGHAM: Resolutions of James J. Ollive Post, No. 722, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Hyde Park, Mass., urging passage of adjusted compensation bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3378. By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Resolutions of Pennsylvania Forestry Association, favoring the transfer of the Forestry Service to the Department of the Interior; to the Committee on Agriculture.

3379. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of the American Exporters' and Importers' Association, New York City; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3380. Also, petition of Bommer Bros., New York City; to the Committee on Patents.

3381. Also, petition of Holophane Glass Co. (Inc.) and Duplan Silk Corporation, of New York City; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3382. Also, petition of Mrs. W. D. Ryder, Casa Grande, Ariz.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3383. By Mr. McCORMICK: Petition of sundry citizens of Great Falls, Mont., protesting against the passage of House bill 4388, relating to Sunday observance in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

3384. By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Resolution adopted by the realty board, Pocatello, Idaho, urging a change in the Constitution so as to permit of the enactment of legislation prohibiting the issuance of tax-exempt securities; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

3385. By Mr. YOUNG: Petition of sundry citizens of Glenfield, N. Dak., praying for the adoption of Senate resolution 133, providing for an investigation of the present grain market; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, Thou art not only teaching us by the passage of the years the necessity of numbering our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom, but Thou art teaching us amid the sadness of separation. In the grief of this hour we come to Thee, asking that Thine own wisdom may be realized, that with confidence in Thine own direction of affairs this mourning company may understand that God reigns even in the councils of the Nation.

We thank Thee for all that has been committed unto this Chamber of large intelligence and great responsibility. We ask that the memories that have been now created, in view of what has been accomplished in the days gone by, may come with a sweetness and a tenderness, telling us of duties to be done, of responsibilities to be assumed.

May the God of all comfort be in the shadows of a broken family circle and also minister to the State afflicted, to the Nation sorrowing, and to all directly or indirectly affected by this bereavement. We ask in Christ Jesus' name. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

ROBERT L. OWEN and J. W. HARRELD, the Senators from the State of Oklahoma, appeared in their seats to-day.

On request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, December 22, 1921, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR PENROSE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is with a deep sense of personal sorrow that I announce to the Senate the death of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. I have been long in service with him. He is a friend of many years to me, and I am sure that the grief I feel for his death is shared by all who have known him during his distinguished service in the Senate.

In the absence of his colleague from Pennsylvania, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 201) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 4, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, our times are in Thy hand, and in Thee we live and move and have our being. We approach Thee with a psalm of thanksgiving in our hearts. We look back with gratitude and forward with hope. We unite in blessing Thee for the year just closed and commend one another to Thee for the year just opened. Be Thou the spring of our country's happiness and the source of all its hope. Oh, dwell with us that we may face the future with reliance and courage. Guide us into all truth and establish us in that faith that can not be shaken. Encourage us day by day with the tokens of Thy providence. Touch the sick with a healing hand; support us in our losses; comfort all who mourn and bestow upon us the mercy of an understanding heart. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal for Thursday, December 22, 1921, was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what it is proposed to take up to-morrow if the unanimous consent is granted?

Mr. MONDELL. I hope we can take up general debate on the antilynching bill to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that an appropriation bill will be ready to be taken up Thursday?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. Before the holidays we were compelled to dispense with business on account of the absence of a quorum. I want to know whether the majority is going to operate this House or the minority. At the request of several Members I will withdraw the point, Mr. Speaker.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 22, 1921, that committee presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 9548. An act for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia;

H. R. 9464. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, Wash.; and

H. J. Res. 233. Joint resolution providing for the postponement of the World's Dairy Congress.

DEATH OF SENATOR PENROSE, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania, is dead. Just as the New Year appeared to living men he disappeared from amongst them. This short and simple announcement made to the House is in keeping with the simplicity of his life, because he cared not for display or fulsome speech.

At a future date, not remote, an opportunity will be given those who may desire to comment upon the character and public services of this commanding American figure, whose work for nearly 25 years was closely and prominently associated with all the affairs touching the welfare of the Nation. I will say no more here than move the adoption of the resolutions customary upon such occasions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 255.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. BOIES PENROSE, a Senator of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 4, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

439. A letter from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting report of the company for the year 1921; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

440. A letter from the Comptroller General of the General Accounting Office, transmitting report of officers of the War Department who were delinquent in rendering or transmitting accounts to the proper office in Washington or in payment of balances found due from them during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

441. A letter from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting statement showing the typewriters, adding machines, and other similar labor-saving devices purchased during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on Appropriations.

442. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, transmitting report showing relief granted to Maj. H. B. Pratt, United States Marine Corps, during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

443. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill for the purchase of the naval aviation station at Galveston, Tex., and appropriating $18,000 for same; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

444. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a statement of the action of the department in respect to accidents sustained or caused by barges while in tow through the open sea during the fiscal year 1921; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

445. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a statement of the expenditures in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

446. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting copies of some recent correspondence relating to the disposition of Fort Griswold; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

447. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of expenditures on account of appropriation "Contingent expenses, War Department," during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

448. A letter from the national commander of the American Legion, transmitting report of the proceedings of the American Legion for the year 1921; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

449. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of Oakland, Berkeley, and Albany Harbors, Calif. (H. Doc. No. 144); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLANTON: A bill (H. R. 9706) to separate the Government from the restaurant business; to the Committee on Accounts.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9707) to drop from the Government pay roll all barbers in the House Office Building and to discontinue furnishing to the House barber shop at Government expense the rent of shop, furniture, and fixtures, lights, water, heat, electrical power, and towels; to the Committee on Accounts.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9708) to drop from the Government pay roll the body rubbers in the bathrooms of the House Office Building and to discontinue furnishing free baths at Government expense; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. HUSTED: A bill (H. R. 9709) to provide for the disposition of any funds received in payment of principal or interest of foreign loans held by the United States in the care and maintenance of soldiers and sailors of the World War and their dependent families; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMSON: A bill (H. R. 9710) authorizing extensions of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and town-lot purchases within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, N. Dak. and S. Dak.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9711) to require all dealers in alfalfa and red clover seed to keep stock records and label parcels of such seed so as to show lot number, place of origin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father! By that endearing name Thou dost come very close to us, and we would be very close to Thee, so that in the duties which may claim attention to-day and the problems that are presented there may be given to us constantly the assurance that we do not stand alone or depend only upon our own wisdom. Help us, our Father, to understand Thee as the interpreter to us of all lines of duty and responsibility. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The Vice President resumed the chair.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CLERICAL SERVICE IN PORTO RICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 183, certain information in regard to persons who are not natives appointed to clerical and other positions in the Territorial and local governments of Porto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

OPERATIONS OF THE FIRST PROVISIONAL AIR BRIGADE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War acknowledging the receipt of a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, dated December 13, 1921, transmitting Senate resolution 188, directing the Secretary of War to send to the Senate the report of Gen. Mitchell relative to the sinking of battleships at Langley Field filed in September, 1921, and stating that he was directed by the President to say that he considered the transmission of the report in question incompatible with the public interest, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PROPERTY REPORT OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS OF THE SENATE (S. DOC. NO. 111).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, transmitting, pursuant to law, a full and complete account of all the property in his possession and in the Senate Office Building belonging to the United States Senate, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

TYPEWRITERS, ETC., EXCHANGED BY CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing typewriters, adding machines, and other similar labor-saving devices exchanged in part payment for new machines during the fiscal year 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORT OF THE CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that company for the year 1921, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I present an editorial respecting a resolution providing for an investigation of the activities of the Civil Service Commission, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News.]

DEBASING THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The story is told that on one occasion Joseph P. Tumulty, then secretary to President Wilson, had an informal but earnest conversation with Martin A. Morrison, head of the United States Civil Service.

Why, so Tumulty is said to have inquired of Morrison, were more than half of the postmasterships under a Democratic President being given to Republicans?

It was a perfectly natural thing, so Morrison told him. The Republicans had been in control of the Government for 16 years. During that time quite a large number of men had learned all about the business of being postmaster. They were able to obtain high grades in any kind of an examination. And since under the Wilson administration the choice went to the applicant with the highest rating, unless there were a war veteran with a high rating also seeking the office, the experienced Republican postmasters just had to be chosen in many instances.

Republicans were named postmasters in several of the big cities.

Now that there has been a change of administration, however, it is declared that there also has been a change in policy. It is asserted that all three of the Civil Service Commissioners are Republicans, whereas the law provides that not more than two shall be members of the President's party.

Further, it is asserted that under the present plan, whereby three names are certified to the President instead of one, political influence easily makes up for the difference in their examination papers.

So far from taking advantage of the experience in postal affairs gained by those Democrats who held post offices during the preceding eight years, the administration, it is alleged, is throwing them out as rapidly as possible, regardless of the manner in which they pass the examinations.

A specific instance alleged is that of the Dayton (Ohio) post office, where three Democrats are said to have passed the three highest examinations only to have one of their names stricken off and a Republican dentist's name substituted therefor. The dentist, incidentally, was Republican county chairman. He is now postmaster.

A congressional investigation of this seeming new attempt to debase the civil service is being demanded by Senator ROBINSON. It should be made and should be thorough.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have here a brief article written by Hon. Charles S. Thomas, formerly a member of this body, relative to the treaty and cognate questions. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

By the express letter of the Constitution treaties made and to be made under the authority of the United States become parts "of the supreme law of the land." As such they are obligatory both upon our Government and upon all signatory powers. Obviously, therefore, the agreements which they embody should be expressed in words of precision, molded into clear and crisp sentences free from ambiguities and requiring no interpretation. This task is, nevertheless, most difficult of accomplishment since poverty of language coupled with the confusion attendant upon word definitions frequently lead to serious differences of meaning which may ripen into misunderstanding. A careful study of the phraseology of the four-power treaty justifies the apprehension that some of its covenants are not as happily phrased as they should be, as they have within a fortnight after its signature developed a serious conflict of construction between the President and his representatives.

The construction given to article 1 by the President and that expressed by many if not all the members of the conference differ as widely as the poles. Both may be consistent with the phraseology of the article, but both can not be right, and the consequences flowing or which may flow from that construction which ultimately prevails are so tremendous that full concord should be reached as to one or the other of them before the treaty is finally ratified and exchanged.

The President's construction is, I think, in full accord with public understanding of the subject. He excludes the islands constituting the Japanese Empire from the circumstances of the treaty albeit they are "in the region of the Pacific Ocean," and doubtless upon the theory that the high contracting parties, committed in principle to the limitation of naval armaments, covenated as a condition to its acceptance to respect their several island possessions, including the British "dominions" of Australia and New Zealand, thus dispensing with the substantial basis or object requiring the maintenance and increase of their huge naval establishments. If the terminology of the treaty accomplishes this object without going beyond it, ratification coupled with a reservation limiting it to island possessions acquired and held by the high contracting parties through an unchallenged tenure at the time of such ratification would seem to be desirable.

Popular interpretation of the scope of the treaty unquestionably confined its application to islands of the Pacific other than the Japanese "homeland," as the President has expressed it. No hint of its broader purpose was given by Senator LODGE in presenting it to the Plenary Conference. His avoidance of that subject, whether premeditated or fortuituous, not only justified but necessitated the assumption that the treaty affected each of the signatory powers alike. Nothing said at the time by any of those in authority indicated any other construction. We may well imagine the consequences had Senator LODGE even remotely hinted that the fateful words "insular dominions" had been deliberately inserted into the treaty for the purpose of including the Japanese homelands within the four corners of the instrument. It would have met with immediate and universal objection, as it will be hereafter vigorously if not successfully contested. America was never enamored of secret diplomacy, and she will hardly overlook this act of her own representatives, however lofty their motive or sincere their purpose. The President's announcement was no surprise, since it must be inferred that even he was not fully informed of the action of his representatives in purposely framing the treaty to include Japan. He merely voiced the common understanding of the effect of its provisions. If his construction of the treaty is erroneous and its terms are susceptible both of his own and the larger interpretation intended by the members of the conference, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the United States, Great Britain, and France may be held to have jointly undertaken "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the existing political Government and territorial integrity" of Japan. Article 2 then becomes article 10 of the Versailles treaty, but shorn of its reciprocal obligations and limited in its application to Japan alone.

The delegates representing the United States and Great Britain now tell us what they should have said at the outset, that the treaty does and was deliberately designed to accomplish this identical thing, albeit the text of article 1 is so phrased as to have misled both the popular and the executive judgment in construing it. Such duplicity of expression was doubtless not intentional; nevertheless the episode is most unfortunate. The President and the public did not know because they did not for a moment conceive that the term "insular dominions" had been adopted by the draftsmen of the treaty as the equivalent of "Japan." Its use for that purpose, however well intentioned, will prove to be unfortunate. It would have been much more to the credit of American diplomacy and in keeping with American standards of negotiation had the island Empire been specifically named as the principal beneficiary of the covenant. It was only natural that the average man or indeed the average statesman should identify Australia and New Zealand as the insular dominions referred to in view of their size, their importance, and the character of their governmental structure.

A glance at the text of the treaty may in this connection prove beneficial. I quote the first sentence of article 1:

"The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean."

The article then provides a method for considering and adjusting any controversy arising out of any Pacific question which might develop between themselves involving such rights, while article 2 convenants that if "such rights" shall be threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, "the high contracting parties will communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken jointly or separately to meet the exigencies of the particular occasion."

Japan is an island Empire "within the region of the Pacific Ocean." The Monroe doctrine which applies to the Western Hemisphere was defined by the Versailles treaty as a "regional understanding." The word "region" in a broad sense is defined as "a place without special reference to location or extent." The islands comprising Japan proper would therefore seem to be quite as well within the purview of the treaty's geographical boundaries as Australia or New Zealand and may be said to be comprised within the covenant of article 1 of the treaty as an insular dominion. It should therefore be excluded either by amendment or by antecedent construction if the treaty is to be reciprocal in its operation. The ratification of a treaty whose text breeds fundamental differences of construction before it is even submitted to the Senate for consideration is unthinkable.

If the Japanese homeland falls within the provisions of article 1, it is obvious that she may invoke the processes of article 2 whenever threatened by the aggressive action of any other power. Article 1 as framed contains no words of exclusion or of limitation beyond the restriction of its operation to the region of the Pacific Ocean. The word "dominions," chosen as we are now told for the express purpose of bringing Japan within the treaty, is sufficiently broad to accomplish the purpose, notwithstanding it could be narrowed so as to refer to Australia and New Zealand alone without doing injustice to the thing it symbolizes. Lexicographers differ scarcely at all in defining it as meaning lordship, sovereign, or supreme authority and the right of uncontrolled possession and disposal. If applied to the political organizations of Australia and New Zealand, which the public naturally and properly did, the word is technically restricted and yet appropriate. On the other hand, there is nothing in the context of the treaty to indicate the restriction, and as we are now informed that the word was deliberately employed in its broadest sense and with the intention of including Japan, that result will of course follow the ratification of the treaty.

This will invest Japan with a one-sided alliance potent for the preservation of her existing Government and territorial integrity from all external aggressions, whatever their object or their origin. This being true, it must follow that any question or controversy arising between Japan and the United States, irrespective of its genesis or its object, will involve Japan's "rights" as defined by article 1, and thus bring our Government under the operation of the last clause of that article, whereas a similar controversy between the United States and France or France and Great Britain must, to invoke the precautionary procedure of that article, concern our or their insular possessions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

Japan thus becomes the most favored nation. The advantage derived from such a treaty is immeasurable. She may therefore well consent to the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese treaty in exchange for it. Per contra, America may find herself so involved with Japan by the course of events that France and Great Britain may range themselves against her or so involve France or Great Britain with Japan that America may be required to act with Japan against one or both of them. Such a situation may develop whether the controversy concerns China, Korea, Russia, or other problems of continental character and origin. The issue might be unrelated to any islands of the Pacific, yet it must inevitably affect the insular dominions of Japan, for it will be noted that the treaty expressly includes controversies arising out of any Pacific question, and these are as likely to be continental as insular. The treaty should not be ratified until this covenant is expressly limited to the territory and the problems it was ostensibly and originally designed to cover.

For it seems too clear for argument that Japan's "said rights" in relation to her insular dominions will be "threatened by aggressive action," as contemplated by article 2, whatever its character or purpose. Her insular dominions constitute her empire, and no one can say where her "dominions" end and her "island possessions" begin, unless the distinction be arbitrarily drawn between mandates and ownership. She secures more benefit from and incurs less obligation under the treaty than any of the cocontracting powers. It is a one-sided alliance, with little compensatory advantages. The President must have been keenly sensible of this situation and therefore impelled to express the opinion that "the homeland of Japan" did not come within the phrase "insular possessions and insular dominions under the four-power agreement except as territory proper of any other nation which is a party to the agreement." It is to be regretted that he yielded his view to that of his delegation to the conference.

The potentialities of the conference construction of the treaty are many-sided. The existing status of the island of Sakhalien, with an area of 24,560 square miles, furnishes an illustration. The south half of this island was ceded to Japan by Russia in the treaty of Portsmouth of 1895 and thereby incorporated into the dominions of the former country. Because of an attack upon one of her garrisons by Russian residents north of the boundary line, Japan in 1920 took forcible possession of the Russian part of the island. Within the past year she has substituted her own for the preexisting government, and, notwithstanding the protest of the Russian authorities and the inhabitants, she has forcibly annexed it to her domains. I am aware of the announcement of her purpose to occupy only until reparation is made for the slaughter of her subjects and the injury to their property; but the western world has long become familiar with the divergence between Japanese declarations and Japanese policy, the one being the voice of the civil administration, the other the enforcement of the mandates of the elder statesmen translated into action by the military authorities. Japan's title to the north half of Sakhalien can not legally or morally withstand the protest of Russia nor be retained unless guaranteed by the four-power treaty as it now stands. It is inevitable that Russia's demand for its restoration, whether the island be one of possession or one of dominion, may constitute "aggressive action threatening the rights of Japan."

This will set the treaty in motion when the United States will be called upon to recognize its duties under the agreement. Declining to do so, the treaty will be denounced by Japan and every problem of the Far East will again appear to vex the peace of nations. Competition in naval construction which the conference was called to foreclose will revive, and our relations with Japan become more sinister than before. The treaty must be limited to insular possessions, including New Zealand and Australia, if it is to accomplish the objects of its negotiation. As sure as Russia recovers from the nightmare of bolshevism and resumes the habiliments of an orderly and capable government, the right of Japan to Russian Sakhalien will be challenged, when we must either stand with Japan under the treaty or incur the reproach of treating it as a scrap of paper. It must before ratification be purged of any covenant which commits America to the political fortunes of any nation. Such a price is too much to pay for limitation of armament, a policy which in its last analysis can and will be arranged by ourselves and in conformity with the enlightened opinion of the Nation.

If, however, the treaty is to stand as negotiated, it is proper to suggest the need for a change in Japan's continental policy. She has annexed Korea, unmindful alike of her treaty obligations and the bitter and continuing protest of the Korean people. She clings to Port Arthur and Manchuria and will voluntarily surrender them neither now nor hereafter. She defends this action by stoutly maintaining that it is essential to her national defense and safety, that an independent Korea or Manchuria, or a Korea or Manchuria in the possession or under the control of another, menaces not only her integrity but her political existence. She either ignores or challenges the course of history which teaches that possession of an alien country and the oppression of an alien race proves to be a sword instead of a shield when the hour of crisis comes. Korea's plea for independence is unanswerable. It may be denied, but it can not be controverted. It is a far eastern problem of the first magnitude which will remain when the conference shall have adjourned. That ghost will walk amid the congratulations crowning its achievements and will persist until the time shall come when it will be heard and heeded.

If the four-power treaty embracing and enveloping all Japan, a treaty which panoplies the empire with the triple armor of her three great associates, is to be ratified as drawn it is due to China and to Korea as affecting the peace of the world to remind Japan that being thus assured against the possibility of danger from any source she may well compensate her allies by considering the expediency, to say nothing of the justice, of withdrawing from Korea and absolving China from the burden of all treaties and agreements negotiated or executed between the two powers since 1904, of which China so justly complains.

Japan will no longer need Korea or any outlying domains either for her defense or her protection. With the treaty she can afford to be generous and prove to the world the sincerity of her oft-repeated assurances of rectitude of purpose and sincerity of intention in her dealings with weak and defenseless peoples inhabiting the adjacent mainland. This would be an easy and graceful solution of nearly all far eastern problems by removing them.

Senator LODGE'S assurance to the conference that no element of force lurks behind the provisions of the treaty is not consistent with his oft-repeated charge in the Senate that force constituted the indispensable sanction of Article X of the Versailles treaty. He was right then and is wrong now. "The most efficient measures" whatever they may be are to be ascertained in the communication under Article II of the treaty when rights are threatened by aggressive action. These must include a resort to force should that be considered more efficient than less drastic measures; and force has thus far proven not only the most but the only effective weapon for the enforcement of national demands and resistance to national aggressions. The day may have arrived when it can be dispensed with, but the portents of the coming of that blessed time are too somber to be encouraging. If when it becomes necessary the four powers may not resort to force to compel the observance of their covenants, the treaty is worthless beyond the limitation of armaments it is designed to accomplish.

C. S. THOMAS.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House unanimously adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6557) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto Rico, and to pay for same out of duties collected in Porto Rico, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented two telegrams in the nature of memorials from Dr. J. R. Brown, of St. Louis, Mo., and James E. Edward, George L. Johnson, R. L. Raiborne, Albert E. Russell, Guy L. Robinson, C. R. Miller, Edw. L. Thompson, Franklin A. Tyler, Grover Daniel, James W. Thornton, William G. Carhart, George C. Jones, E. H. Hamilton, E. J. Shea, J. J. Heithans, A. M. Rothrock, M. W. Watters, J. W. Fennell, and A. V. Derby, of Greenville, S. C., remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the medical personnel of Reserve Corps, United States Public Health Service, to civilian status, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the National Game Conference of the American Game Protective Association, at New York December 12, 1921, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, game refuges and breeding grounds for migratory birds, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. LADD presented a petition of sundry members of Walhalla Lodge, No. 34, Order of the Eastern Star, of Walhalla, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented resolutions adopted by the Iron Mountain Commercial Club, of Iron Mountain, and Ontonagon Exchange Club, of Ontonagon, both in the State of Michigan, favoring improvement of the present water routes via the St. Lawrence River and the Welland Canal, so as to make them navigable for ocean-going vessels, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the National Game Conference of the American Game Protective Association, at New York December 12, 1921, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, game refuges and breeding grounds for migratory birds, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. McCUMBER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Glenfield, Courtenay, and Kensal, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of Senate resolution 133, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the conditions affecting the demand for foreign disposition, movement, and use of American exported grain (which was considered and agreed to on Dec. 22, 1921), which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Larimore (N. Dak.) Commercial Club, protesting against the enactment of legislation permitting vessels in domestic commerce of the United States to pass through the Panama Canal free of toll, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Fortnightly Club, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation adopting a metric system of weights and measures, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented the petition of John Garchk and sundry other citizens of Wishek, N. Dak., praying for the adoption of the so-called Smoot manufacturers' tax system, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Larimore (N. Dak.) Commercial Club, favoring the enactment of legislation to reduce freight rates, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted by the board of management of Eve Lear Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New Haven, Conn., favoring the passage of House bill 6774, setting apart the battle field of Yorktown for a national military park, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from La Croix Murdock Post 585, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Meriden, Conn., favoring the immediate passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Norwich (Conn.) Central Labor Union at a meeting held December 6, 1921, protesting against the appointment of additional Federal judges or increase of salaries for such judges, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens and ladies of the Home Club, of Cromwell, Conn., praying for the limitation of armament by international agreement, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry employees of the Empire Knife Co., Ralph W. Moulthrop, C. R. Holland, and William Newett, all of Winsted; of the Sessions Clock Co., of Forestville; and of the Challenge Cutlery Corporation, of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring inclusion of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Derby and Shelton Board of Trade, of Derby, Conn., favoring the inclusion of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of sundry citizens of Waterville, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation fixing the price on turkey red wheat at $1.10 per bushel and proportionately on blue stem and marquis, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Emergency Housing Association of the District of Columbia, praying for the appointment of a joint commission of both Houses to begin at once a survey and investigation of the alley and slum problems in the District of Columbia so as to recommend a solution for the alley housing problem, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 22, 1921, they presented to the President of the United States an enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress;

S. 2591. An act to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River; and

S. 2790. An act to authorize the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., to construct a bridge across Escambia River at or near Century, Fla.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2902) to amend section 8 of the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1921, relative to turning Chippewa Indian hospitals over to the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2903) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 2904) to extend the time of payment of construction charges on Government reclamation projects and authorizing the transfer of money to the reclamation fund; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2905) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to permit prospecting, development, and utilization of mineral resources in national parks under certain conditions; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2906) granting an increase of pension to John T. Rudy;

A bill (S. 2907) granting a pension to Katherine Urell;

A bill (S. 2908) granting a pension to S. W. Callahan; and

A bill (S. 2909) granting an increase of pension to Herman Bindewald; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2910) to provide for the establishment of a dairying and live-stock experiment station at Mandan, N. Dak.; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 2911) for the allowance of certain claims for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours at certain navy yards certified by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 2912) granting a pension to Elizabeth Shufelt; and

A bill (S. 2913) granting a pension to Mathew Galvin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2914) to authorize the opening of a minor street from Georgia Avenue to Ninth Street NW., through squares 2875 and 2877, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2915) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914; August 15, 1914; March 3, 1915; September 7, 1916; and June 21, 1917; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 2917) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

A bill (S. 2918) granting a pension to Lydia A. Vickory (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 2919) to extend for the period of two years the provisions of Title II of the food control and the District of Columbia rents act, approved October 22, 1919, as amended; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2920) granting a pension to Margaret R. Hull (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the committee on commerce, trade, and commercial law of the American Bar Association have prepared a bill to amend the national bankruptcy act. The bill has been approved by the American Bar Association, and I introduce it and ask for its appropriate reference.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2921) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2922) granting a pension to Clint T. Littlefield; to the Committee on Pensions.

WISCONSIN BAND OF POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. OWEN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2916) for the payment to certain members of the Wisconsin Band of Pottawatomie Indians of their share of proceeds of sale of tribal lands, which was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CURTIS. From the title of the bill I think it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OWEN. I have introduced the bill by request of the attorney of the Pottawatomie Indians of Canada, and they desire that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing that the bill should be referred to that committee if that is desired, but it appears to me that such reference is hardly appropriate.

Mr. OWEN. I myself think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and possibly after a report shall have been made by the Committee on Indian Affairs the bill might with propriety then be referred to the Committee on Claims, but, in my judgment, in the first instance it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for about two minutes while I make a brief explanation of the proposed amendment.

The amendment which I have proposed to the Constitution abolishes the Electoral College and provides for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote of the people.

When our forefathers adopted the Constitution they were afraid to put too much power directly in the hands of the people, and so they provided for the election of the Chief Magistrate by an Electoral College. The members of this Electoral College, the Constitution provides, shall be chosen in such manner as the legislatures of the several States shall provide. Thus the election of the Chief Executive of the Nation was placed two steps beyond the reach of the voter. It was intended that these presidential electors should exercise a discretion in the selection of a President and Vice President, but as time went on and the people became anxious for a greater voice in their own Government, they provided for a method of instructing the presidential electors through the instrumentality of party conventions. This has taken away from the presidential elector the discretion which the law in fact gives him, but it has not by any means placed the selection of President and Vice President in the hands of the people themselves.

In order to be elected President of the United States it is necessary to be nominated by some political party. There is no other practical way of electing a President so long as our antiquated Electoral College system remains a part of the Constitution. The practical result is that any man or set of men who are able, through any means whatever, to control presidential conventions, do in fact, through such means, select the President and Vice President of our country. The only voice that the voter has in the entire transaction is to register a choice between the nominees of the different political conventions.

It is common knowledge that the people have very little, if anything, to say in regard to the nomination of presidential candidates by political parties. Nominations for President are in fact made, as everybody knows, by a few so-called leaders, who through various and devious ways known only to the politician control and handle the misled and worn-out party convention delegate in accordance with the wishes and the decrees of political bosses. On election day the people find that the voter has nothing left to decide except to choose between two evils, and there is no way by which he can properly protest against such arbitrary control of nominations. He is as helpless on election day as though he were entirely disfranchised.

In every State some provision is made by which an independent candidate for office can have his name placed on the official ballot. Such provisions of law are not accidental, they are fundamental. They are a necessary part of every plan of election machinery where the citizen is given the freedom of voting as he pleases. No such provisions, however, can apply to the election of President and Vice President so long as the Electoral College plan remains as part of our Constitution. If the Electoral College were abolished, then independent candidates for President could have their names placed upon the official ballots of the various States by complying with the method provided by State statutes. The abolishment of the Electoral College would make it not only possible but practical for the people to disregard party entirely and elect independent candidates to the offices of President and Vice President. In addition to this, such change would have the beneficial effect of restraining political leaders and machines from imposing upon the party and the people unworthy candidates for office. If the Electoral College were abolished, an independent candidate for President would be not only a possibility but a probability whenever the conventions of the great political parties were manipulated and controlled by unfair and dishonorable means.

Under present conditions it is an impossibility for any voter to vote for a candidate for President on one ticket and a candidate for Vice President on another ticket. Neither can he vote for President without at the same time voting for Vice President. If the voter is in favor of the candidate for President on one ticket and the candidate for Vice President on a different ticket, it is a physical impossibility under existing conditions for him to register his choice, and yet it must be admitted that in a free country, if we are in reality permitting the people to rule and to select by their votes their President and Vice President, it is necessary that such choice should be free and untrammeled and the voter should be allowed to vote for any person for either one of the offices and have such vote counted as cast. Such right is in fact fundamental in a free country.

The effect of eliminating from the Constitution of the United States the ancient and useless Electoral College would be to give the citizen a free and untrammeled right to vote for President and Vice President. It would place the office of President of the United States within the hands of the people themselves where it is now supposed to be, though, as a matter of fact, on account of the Electoral College, it is beyond the control of the people and is under the control of manipulated conventions.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 151) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the election of the President and Vice President by a direct vote was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL IN ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a joint resolution for the reduction of the personnel in the Army and the Navy. Technically there should be two joint resolutions—one to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and the other to the Committee on Military Affairs. I offer it, however, as one joint resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. Later I may offer another joint resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

May I say that it seems to me, if we are earnest in our desire to promote world peace, we ought to begin reducing our Army and Navy below present limits? Moreover, the costs of maintaining the Army and the Navy are so enormous, even with the rather small Army we now have, that the American people, in my judgment, will not and ought not to submit thereto. We are expending now for our Army of less than 200,000 men more than or nearly as much as Germany paid to maintain her army when it approximated seven or eight hundred thousand or a million men, and some steps should be taken either to reduce the number far below the present limit or to reduce the expenses. The overhead of both the Army and the Navy is entirely too great. We have not learned the art of economy in handling the Army and in handling the Navy. When we appropriate, as we did for the current fiscal year, in the neighborhood of $800,000,000 for the Army and the Navy, it is entirely too much. It is time there should be a halt, and I hope that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs will address themselves to a reduction of the personnel involved in the Army and in the Navy.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) providing for the immediate reduction of the Army and the Navy was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. HARRIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

UNITED STATES NAUTICAL ALMANAC.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk. It simply calls for information from the Navy Department, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 202) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a copy of the statement made by Prof. Eichelberger regarding conditions in the Nautical Almanac office, referred to in the report of the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory under date of July 28, 1921; also a copy of the statement of Prof. Campbell relating to Prof. Hink's article, referring to the error in the eclipse map of May 28 and 29, 1919, and referred to in the same report.

MARY ROBERTS.

Mr. STANFIELD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 203), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mary Roberts, widow of Charles F. Roberts, late a private of the Capitol police, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

On December 22, 1921:

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service may make its report to Congress.

On December 28, 1921:

S. 2591. An act to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River; and

S. 2790. An act to authorize the boards of county commissioners of Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties, Fla., to construct a bridge across the Escambia River at or near Century, Fla.

CONDITION OF SUPREME COURT DOCKET.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 198) submitted by Mr. TRAMMELL December 20, 1921, as follows:

Whereas all causes brought to the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision should be acted upon by said court without undue delay; and

Whereas if the docket of the said court is so congested that litigants are unable to obtain a prompt decision in the court of last resort the Congress should afford the relief necessary to correct such conditions; and

Whereas the Senate desires information upon the question of whether or not there is such number of cases constantly pending in said court as to make it impossible for the court to dispose of cases without long delay and hardship upon litigants because of their inability to get prompt action in this the highest court in the land: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is requested to direct the clerk of said court to furnish to the Senate such data and information as may be necessary to indicate the condition of the docket of the said court; to advise the number of cases on the docket awaiting final disposition by the court; to give the average length of time required for a decision after cases are ready for action by the court; and to furnish such further information as the Chief Justice may order the clerk to transmit to the Senate in response to this request regarding the status of the litigation in the said court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, purely for information I wish to inquire of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who is the author of the resolution, why it is that the request contained in the resolution is not addressed directly to the clerk of the Supreme Court? Why is the request made of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is merely a matter of procedure. The request was addressed to the Chief Justice, and he was requested to direct the clerk to furnish the information as a matter of courtesy to the court and to the Chief Justice. I thought that was the more proper way of proceeding than to ask for the information directly from the clerk of the court. Frankly, that is my reason for so phrasing the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the procedure, if there is a procedure, in such cases, but it seems to me that it would be better to make the request directly of the clerk of the Supreme Court. There probably would not be any objection on the part of the court to having a legislative body make such a request, but if we could conceive of an objection, we should probably have to go before the court and make application in the regular way and select some one to appear before the court in order to get the action of the court.

I may be entirely wrong, for, as I have said, this resolution is something new to me, but it does seem to me that it proposes a wrong procedure.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in view of the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, and irrespective of whether or not the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is advisable, I should like to know what is the object of the resolution. Is there anything stated in the resolution as to what is expected to be done, or does it indicate that any legislation is contemplated?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, there is no legislation contemplated by the resolution. The whole object and purpose of the resolution are to secure information as to the status of the business before the Supreme Court, it being particularly in mind to investigate, according to the information furnished by the court, as to whether or not business is expeditiously dispatched by the court and as to whether or not when a litigant gets into the United States Supreme Court he can obtain a decision within a reasonable time after the case reaches the court and is ready for action by the court. That is the object and purpose of the resolution. Of course there is no use to attempt to discuss here at this time, upon what we might call hearsay statements, the condition of the docket of the court. What I desire is to get accurate and definite information from the court, and then we might discuss the condition of the docket of the court.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not trying to interfere with the Senator's intention to secure information. I am not familiar with that phase of the matter; but if any Senator wants any information and this is the proper way to get it, I certainly should not object. It seems to me, however, that by the resolution as drawn we are putting in operation the court itself. If we want to do that, we ought to select some one to appear in a regular way before the court, and perhaps also the clerk would want to appear by attorney and contest our request. I may be wrong; there may be a precedent for the proceeding which is proposed, and it may be that this will be considered the right course to follow, but it seems to me that it is not. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida if he is not willing that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course, I would have no serious objection to that; but I think the resolution is very plain; it shows upon its face its object and its purpose. It does not state that the court is behind with its business or that it is acting in a dilatory manner in disposing of litigation; it makes no affirmatve assertion whatever. It is purely in the nature of an inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that, but I think we ought to go about it in the proper way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think the Judiciary Committee, so far as that is concerned, could throw any light upon it at all. It is a matter of procedure, and I think as to the matter of procedure the method proposed by the resolution is more courteous, being addressed to the Chief Justice, and asking him to request the clerk of the court, who works under the direction of the court, to furnish the information.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment. It may be that the course suggested by the Senator from Florida is the proper one to pursue; I am not saying that it is not; but it does not seem to me that it is. However, the Judiciary Committee could easily ascertain as to that; at any rate, some committee, it seems to me, ought to do so; and the Judiciary Committee, in my opinion, is the proper one to consider the matter. I do not wish to delay action; I have no objection to passing the resolution when it is once ascertained what the proper course is, but it seems to me under all the circumstances that the Judiciary Committee ought to consider the question before we act upon it. I therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, before the vote is had on the motion I desire to say that if the resolution is designed for the purpose of obtaining information with a view of remedial legislation to relieve any congestion that may exist in the court, of course there could be no objection to it; but, as I understand the Senator from Florida, that is not the object of the resolution.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not understand upon what basis the Senator makes that statement. The resolution indicates that its purpose and object are to afford relief if there is congestion in the docket. That is the plain wording of the resolution; that is the idea—to furnish relief if the docket is in such condition that relief should be afforded. That is the object and purpose of the resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. The basis of my statement was what the Senator said in response to an inquiry that I made a few moments ago. I asked him if there was any remedial legislation intended to be predicated upon the information asked for, and I understood him to say no; that he had none in mind, or words to that effect.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I said that I had in mind no specific legislation, because I had not as yet obtained the information. That is what my reply meant. Of course we can not have in mind specific legislation as to a condition of facts with which we have not yet become acquainted and concerning which we are seeking information. The whole object and purpose of the resolution are to afford relief if relief is necessary.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, if no remedial legislation is contemplated, I certainly think the resolution is improper. I do not think it is proper for the Senate of the United States or the Congress or any other authority to be lecturing the Supreme Court of the United States as to the manner in which it shall dispose of its business, and I should object to any action that could be so construed.

There is a provision in the resolution that certainly is rather remarkable; I refer to the provision that the Chief Justice shall direct the clerk of the court to report as to the average length of time required by the court to dispose of the cases which may be heard by it. Mr. President, all cases are not alike. They can not be disposed of according to a mathematical rule. The records are different. Sometimes they consist of a few pages and sometimes of thousands of pages. Sometimes the cases involve questions of fact, sometimes questions of general law, and sometimes great constitutional questions. No rule as to the time within which the case on the docket shall or can be disposed of, no regulation as to the number of hours or days they can be held before being disposed of, is possible or ought to be made; for the court ought to give every case it has such consideration as that particular record and the questions involved in it demand and require. The members of every court must be the sole judges of the time they should devote to the hearing and consideration of cases heard.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest that according to the press the Chief Justice himself has recently delivered an address in which he pointed out some matters which ought to have consideration. As I recall, one of the things he mentioned was that there ought to be a limitation on the obligatory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and a wider discretion given to the Supreme Court in the matter of the disposition of cases. So I am inclined to think this resolution is entirely in order, as enabling Congress to have that information which the court already has, and which might lead to some remedial legislation along that line, as indicated already by expressions of the Chief Justice.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] will permit this resolution to go to the Judiciary Committee. I think the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is in the main right. I think the Chief Justice has indicated that some restriction of the jurisdiction is necessary. I am very firmly of the opinion that there are lots of cases going to the Supreme Court that never ought to go there, and that certain restrictions upon the jurisdiction can be made; but I suggest that this resolution go to the Judiciary Committee. Undoubtedly the chairman of the Judiciary Committee can get from the Chief Justice any information that he desires, and after the chairman and the Judiciary Committee have considered the matter they may wish to ask the Chief Justice if he has any suggestions as to legislation. Therefore, I think it would be orderly for the resolution to go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the motion that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Of course, all that I desire is to get the information, and if the rather common hearsay statements are true that the Supreme Court is a year and a half or two years behind with its work some relief in some way should be afforded. We know that it works a great hardship on litigants to have their cases lodged in a court and have them held in that court for a year and a half or two years before they can obtain a decision. I shall not make any statements as to information that has been given me by litigants in which they have claimed that there were long delays in the court, and that they can not get justice without undue delay in the highest court of the land; but this resolution will bring forth that information.

I did not ask to have the court attempt to give the exact number of days and hours that it takes to decide a case. This resolution does not ask for any such information; but it does ask that they give about the average length of time that a case is pending in the court before a decision is reached. I do not think that is an unreasonable request, and I think that information will have an important bearing upon the question of whether or not Congress should take some action to afford relief, if relief is desirable or necessary, to clean up and catch up with the docket in the United States Supreme Court.

I shall not, however, oppose the resolution going to the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think the resolution should go to the committee. It occurs to me that all this information could be secured by writing a letter to the clerk of the court, who undoubtedly has it in his possession. I have not any doubt that the letter would give the information.

It seems to me quite unusual for the Senate to pass a resolution making a request of the Chief Justice of the United States, and I doubt the wisdom of it, unless this information can not be secured officially in some other way. One of the Senators suggested a moment ago that the clerk could furnish the chairman of the Judiciary Committee this information. I have not any doubt at all about it. I think he would furnish it to any Senator who would submit a written request for it; so I think it would be well to send the resolution to the committee and let the committee consider the proper way to get the information that everybody would like to have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF BRIG. GEN. WILLIAM MITCHELL.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, some time ago the Senate passed a resolution directing the Secretary of War to send to the Senate the report, or a copy of the report, of Brig. Gen. Mitchell relative to the operations of the First Provisional Air Brigade with relation to the sinking of battleships near Langley Field, filed in or about September, 1921. We have a reply to that resolution, in which it is stated by the Secretary of War:

> In reply thereto you are informed that I have been directed by the President to say that he considers the transmission of this report incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. President, after these experiments were had near Langley Field a report was filed and published to the world, giving out certain information as to what these experiments disclosed. That report, as I understood, was altogether favorable to one theory of the experiments.

Another report, which was quite in conflict with that theory, was filed by Brig. Gen. Mitchell. If it should be found to be true that Gen. Mitchell's report is the correct one—that is to say, if his theory is the correct theory, and the facts which he gives support his theory—the first report which was put out was wholly misleading. While, of course, I must be content to accept the judgment of the President, because he has the last say about it, as to whether or not the transmission of this report is compatible with the public interest, it does seem to me that if the first report was in the interest of the public, certainly the report which was in contravention of it is entitled to be weighed by the public at the same time.

I know that the report of Brig. Gen. Mitchell would be very interesting. It might materially affect the reputations of some of those who have been passing upon the efficiency of modern battleships; but it would be also interesting to the taxpayers, and I do not see how it would be incompatible with the public interest for it to be known.

I rise only to say that I think I know practically what is in that report; and when the naval appropriation bill reaches the Senate I shall take the responsibility of stating my understanding of what is in the report, and if I should be incorrect in my statements I shall rely upon the Secretary of War to make correct statements in regard to it.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I expect to submit to the Senate some remarks on the Newberry case on Saturday morning at the opening of the session of the Senate, or, if we should have morning business, at the close of the morning business.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a matter which has been briefly discussed by several Senators.

The Federal Reserve Board has been the subject of criticism because of the high salaries which have been paid in some of the districts, and because of the enormous costs which have been incurred in the construction of bank buildings. As a friend of the Federal Reserve Board, and desiring that its activities and its usefulness shall not be in any manner impaired by reason of a lack of public confidence, I feel that steps should be taken by the central authority in Washington to correct the evils which I believe exist in some of the districts.

As illustrative of one of the points which I have in mind, permit me to call attention to a letter which I have just received from the mayor of Salt Lake City. A sentence in that letter reads as follows:

> It appears that the governors of the 12th reserve district have or are about to let the contract for the erection of the Salt Lake building to a San Francisco concern, and, so far as I can ascertain, have given our local contractors no consideration.

In connection with that, I wish to read a sentence from a letter from Mr. H. W. Baum, a distinguished citizen of my State, one for whose integrity I vouch:

> When the Federal reserve bank building now under construction in San Francisco was decided upon they selected the P. J. Walker Co., of San Francisco, as the contractors, and awarded them the work without competition on a cost-and-fee basis.

Mr. President, I desire to protest against the misconduct, I was about to say—and I do not think it is too strong a word—of some of these Federal reserve officials in the manner in which they have proceeded in the construction of buildings. I protest against the policy of constructing bank buildings costing tens of millions of dollars, and I object to the method adopted in letting contracts. There should be no contracts let except upon a competitive basis, and if the board does not take the necessary steps to enforce this policy Congress will, in my opinion, compel them to adopt such course. I have some correspondence relative to the actions of the officials of other districts, and their refusal to follow a competitive policy in the erection of buildings or portions of buildings. I think it is unfair and unjust to the Government if the principle of competition is denied. I sincerely hope that the Federal Reserve Board will take immediate steps to correct a manifest evil.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in connection with what has been said with regard to the Federal Reserve Board's activities, I want to call attention to the constriction of credits during the last year.

The national banks have lost in deposits $2,191,000,000. Their loans and discounts have decreased $1,446,000,000. The State banks have lost in deposits $1,042,000,000. The loans and discounts of the Federal reserve banks have decreased $1,621,000,000. The Federal reserve notes have decreased $957,000,000. The Federal reserve bank notes have decreased approximately $150,000,000.

It is worth while to note these figures because they explain in a very clear way what the effect is on the contraction of credits in this country, and in my judgment they account for a large part of the industrial depression.

MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, for more than 20 years legislation has been before Congress to regulate the five big meat packers. About a year and a half ago the Department of Justice agreed to the entering of a consent decree against the packers by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Legislation afterwards was passed by Congress based on this consent decree and known as the Kendrick-Kenyon bill. A few months ago the Attorney General appointed a representative from his department, one from the Department of Commerce, and one from the Department of Agriculture to hear the five big packers about modifying that decree. I was very sorry, indeed, to hear that, because it will bring the whole matter before Congress again in the event the decree shall be modified. The Federal Trade Commission protested against it through Mr. Durand, one of the able economists in that commission, and later through the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, who filed a written protest against any modification of the decree. The Federal Trade Commission has done more than any other governmental agency to expose the profiteers and reduce the high cost of living.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the remarks of Senator LODGE in regard to the meat packers' fight against the legislation proposed by President Roosevelt for the inspection of meat, to protect the public against poisoned meat, more than 15 years ago.

The Senator from Massachusetts said on June 30, 1906—I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> What has been the history of that group of men who run those packing establishments? It has been a history of utter defiance of law and of public opinion.

In the same speech the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> But I say, Mr. President, and I say it in all seriousness, that those packers in Chicago * * * have done more to advance socialism and anarchism and unrest and agitation than all of the socialistic agitators who stand to-day between the oceans.

It shows that the meat packers, who have kept a lobby here all these years opposing any regulation of their business, are not satisfied with anything that will do justice to the consuming public of this country, and as soon as legislation is passed and a decree is entered they immediately take steps to have it changed. I ask also to have inserted in the RECORD a protest of the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question in regard to this, if he is familiar with the matter. As I understand, this is an application to change the decree?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; to modify a decree entered into in April a year ago.

Mr. SHIELDS. Of course, long after the session of the court in which it was entered had adjourned?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. What is the basis of this attempt to modify a final decree of the court long after the adjournment of the court? Is there a reservation in the decree?

Mr. HARRIS. Not that I know of. I do not think there is.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood, at the time that decree was entered, that there was a reservation, not as to the principles enunciated or the rights adjudicated, but as to the execution of the decree; that there was a reservation to the effect that the Government could apply for such orders as were necessary to enforce and carry out the adjudication made. I also understood that it was a decree by consent from which there could be no appeal or other proceedings for review prosecuted. Of course, I am not attempting to quote the language of the decree, but if I am correct about it, and it was a mere reservation providing for the execution of the decree, that court has no more power to modify that decree than it would have to enact a law. When a court once enters a decree and adjourns, it is a finality. If there was any other rule, if a court could go back and overturn or modify decrees settling the principles of a controversy, and the rights of parties, then the courts ought to be abolished; there would be nothing final in their action. There would be no end to litigation, and no man would be safe in his adjudicated rights.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am not a lawyer, and I am not familiar with the court decrees of this kind, but if this decree is modified as the five big packers are trying to have it done by the Attorney General, for whom I have the highest regard, it will cause great dissatisfaction on the part of the consuming public and will be resented. I hope he will do nothing that will again bring about such trouble in this country as we have had with the five big packers in protecting the hundred million consumers and help reduce the high cost of living for them.

Mr. President, I renew my request to have inserted in the RECORD the protest of the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 14, 1921.

GENTLEMEN: I appear as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission to state to you the attitude of that agency of the Government toward the proposed modification of the decree in question.

It is not my purpose to do more than state the commission's position, the support for which is to be found in the published reports of the commission upon the meat-packing industry which are before you, supplemented in the present instance by the particularized statements of Mr. Durand.

The Federal Trade Commission felt at the time of its entry that the consent decree failed to secure to the public the complete remedy for and protection against the practices charged in the bill of complaint, for which the commission believed sufficient evidence was then available. It was no party to framing the terms of this decree and it was not consulted with reference to its provisions.

The commission feels that the proposed modification would still further lessen the remedial effect of the decree. It would be a surrender of one of the protective measures taken for the public which at the time of the compromise settlement was regarded as essential to the public right and which the respondents were willing to concede in exchange for concessions to them. If the provisions now sought to be eliminated from the decree were then essential to the protection of the public, they are essential now.

The Federal Trade Commission, in the light of its experience with the subject matter and with due regard only to the public right in the maintenance of the principles of free and fair competition, presents its opposition to the proposed course of action with reference to this decree.

By authority of the commission.

NELSON B. GASKILL, Chairman.

EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEYS BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, some days ago I offered a resolution, Senate resolution 191, asking for certain information from the Alien Property Custodian, which resolution is now lying upon the table. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to that resolution, and state that unless the information therein asked for is furnished very soon by the Alien Property Custodian to the President, or to Congress, or to some appropriate agency of the Government, I shall press for the passage of the resolution. Indeed, unless I am assured that the information which is promised is full and complete, I shall ask for a vote upon the resolution within the next day or two.

I call attention to a statement appearing in the New York World under date of December 30, 1921, the opening paragraph of which is as follows:

> President Harding has stepped into the affairs of the Alien Property Custodian's office for the purpose of cutting off some of the large fees allowed by Custodian Thomas W. Miller. Mr. Miller has been called to the White House to discuss circumstances connected with his administration of the enemy property seized during the war.

Mr. President, my resolution calls for information which I think the Senate should possess. We should know what has been done with trust funds, with property seized under the authority of law. It is important to know what is being paid out by way of salaries and compensation and for attorney fees.

The United States is a trustee and can not afford to permit any dissipation of trust funds or any payments that are extravagant or improper. I am not asserting that such is the case, but in view of criticisms as to payments made by the Alien Property Custodian for attorney fees and other costs of administration I have felt that we should have the information called for by the resolution.

Mr. President, my information is that not only under the present Alien Property Custodian, but under his predecessor, enormous fees have been allowed to attorneys and agents, chargeable against the property of the cestui que trust. I do not wish to indulge in unjust or unfair criticism, but I believe that all the facts connected with the Alien Property Custodian's administration should be made known. His task has been a responsible one, and I believe that in the main the task has been well performed.

That there would be criticisms attending the administration of this great trust was to be expected, and I believe that a complete and detailed report will prove reassuring.

As indicated, there will doubtless be matters calling for criticism, and perhaps payments made which can not fairly be defended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire of the Senator the purport of his resolution, what particular information it calls for, and from what source.

Mr. KING. I will read it to the Senator, and that will perhaps give him a better idea of it than if I attempted to state the substance of the resolution. It reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian is directed to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian and the compensation which has been allowed to each, and the character of services performed by each; the names of all attorneys, directors, supervisors, managers, auditors, or other agents appointed by the Alien Property Custodian to take care of or to have the administration of property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian, with the compensation paid to each, or to be paid to each, by the Alien Property Custodian, or out of the trusts or trust funds in his custody; the names of all attorneys appointed or employed by corporations, agents, or individuals who have been or are acting as administrators or caretakers of property for the Alien Property Custodian, and the compensation paid to or to be paid to each; the names of all attorneys who have represented or who now represent claimants to property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian; the names of all attorneys who have represented claimants to whom property has been returned under section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, and the compensation allowed each of such attorneys out of the trust or trust funds subject to such claims; a statement and description of all property sold by the Alien Property Custodian, with the names of the corporations or persons to whom sold, and the amount received therefor; and a statement and description of all property seized or demanded by the Alien Property Custodian since the passage of the resolution declaring a state of peace to exist with Germany, Austria, and Hungary.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator where the resolution is now?

Mr. KING. The resolution is lying upon the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does not the Senator ask permission to have it taken up and passed? There is certainly no objection to it?

Mr. KING. I do not see how there can be any objection to it; but let me say that at the request of a distinguished Senator I withheld a demand for consideration, expecting that within a short time at least a part of this information called for would be submitted to the President by the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will allow me, it seems to me there can be no possible objection to the information being given. In fact, it seems to be only fair that it should be given to the Senate and the country.

Mr. KING. I think it ought to be given; but I shall not ask for the adoption of the resolution this morning. I wish to consult with the Senator to whom I have just referred.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the Alien Property Custodian is making a report. Under the Alien Property Custodian act the custodian is compelled to make a report to Congress every year. I understand that such a report is in process of preparation, and that it is to be submitted to the President. I do not think the former custodian made a report every year; he made one report, and then failed to make any other report; but I have been informed that the information called for by this resolution is now being prepared, and if the Senator will withhold pressing the resolution I will ascertain whether that is the fact or not. I have no objection to the resolution. I believe Congress should have full information regarding all the acts of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion the report which will be submitted will not contain all the information which is sought to be elicited by my resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, even if it is true that all of the information is contained in a report to the President, it would not take very much effort to send that report to the Senate in response to the resolution offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that in view of my statement to a distinguished Senator who spoke to me about the matter, I should not feel like asking for the adoption of the resolution until I confer with him further. However, I feel that the Senate should have the data called for. We should know what disposition is being made of the hundreds of millions seized by the Government. Attorneys have been appointed at enormous salaries and agents in charge of trust property have been paid very large fees, deducted from the property which has been sequestrated. I have been trying for some time to secure the passage of a bill by which the property which was sequestrated should be returned to the owners. I do not believe in a policy of international dishonor, which would result from a confiscation of the property seized by the United States. I do not believe in the confiscation of property which we seized for the purpose of holding during the progress of the war. When peace was declared we should have restored to the owners the property which was sequestrated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator contemplate investigating the acts of the previous Alien Property Custodian? Is that the purport of the resolution?

Mr. KING. The resolution, let me say to the Senator, applies to all Alien Property Custodians. There is no purpose to shield Democrats or to deal with Republican officials any differently than Democratic officials are to be dealt with. I would probe the official acts of Democrats as quickly as I would those of Republicans. Indeed, Democrats are supposed to be judged by a higher standard than Republicans. It has been said that because of their professions in behalf of good government they should be more honest and held to a higher standard of efficiency and integrity.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think this is a partisan question. I think it is a business question entirely.

Mr. KING. I observed a statement in a New York paper, I think the New York World, as follows:

LIMITS ALIEN PROPERTY FEES—PRESIDENT HARDING ACTS ON ALLEGATION OF EXCESSIVE CHARGES.

President Harding has directed Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, to refuse payment of fees demanded by attorneys whenever, in the judgment of the custodian, such fees are excessive, it was stated yesterday at the White House.

The statement also was made that an Executive order had been issued directing disallowance of certain fees, the President acting after investigation of a report that charges made in one or two cases of attorneys employed under the previous administration were excessive. The names of the attorneys involved were not made public.

Mr. President, it may be that these trust funds are being charged with attorney fees and costs for custodians, agents, supervisors, and administration in excess of what would be fair and just. In some cases my information is that these charges have been excessive and exorbitant.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am one of a good many Senators who have not any definite information on the subject covered by this resolution.

I have heard and read of a great many charges which have been made in reference to such property and in reference to the various items that are included in the resolution which the Senator has introduced. I have known that the Senator was behind a resolution of this kind, and I have assumed, and still assume, that he is going to push it, and secure the information he is asking for. I want him to know that other Senators have remained silent and quiet who would otherwise probably have gone into this investigation themselves had they not known that the Senator from Utah was asking for an investigation, and, busy as we all are, we did not want to have duplication of effort. So the Senator has a responsibility resting on him greater than he thinks. I do not want him to have the resolution laid aside indefinitely.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator it will not be laid aside indefinitely, and I can further assure the Senator that if I can have his cooperation and the cooperation of other Senators the Senate will be put in possession of all the information called for in the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. We ought to have the information called for by the resolution. We are entitled to it and the country is entitled to it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the intention of the Senator to address the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; for 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to ask unanimous consent to begin with the calendar where we left off the last time, but as the Senator from Oklahoma wishes to address the Senate I shall withhold the request until after he concludes.

GOLD AND COMMODITY SECURED CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, I introduced this morning a bill proposing to establish a gold and commodity secured currency for use with a view to stabilizing the industrial activities of Europe and with a view to protecting the foreign commerce of the United States. I particularly desire to have the serious attention of the Senate, because while I do not intend to press the bill, I do offer it to the majority party as a means of helping to overcome the present industrial depression in the United States, with a view to rehabilitating our foreign commerce, and with a view, as a means to that end, of restoring industrial activities in Europe.

I believe the suggestions I am about to submit will be of great value to the United States and to the world if it shall meet your approval and support.

I am encouraged to hope that Senators will be disposed to give attention to the proposals which I submit, because I have had unusual opportunity to study the principles of banking. Thirty-two years ago I established the first national bank organized in Indian Territory, now Oklahoma, and was president of it for 10 years. On the 20th of February, 1908, immediately after I entered the Senate, I outlined and advocated before the Senate every principle of importance that afterwards was written into the Federal reserve act, and had the honor of representing the Senate as its chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency at the time the Federal reserve act was written.

Our foreign export trade has been ruined and has fallen off during this past year to the extent of over three billions of dollars, for the very simple reason that Europe can not adequately buy and has so little to sell. I do not consent that any part of the money due us shall be remitted to Europe. Our charities to Europe I gladly commend, but their covenanted debts to the people of the United States must be paid. They are not bankrupt.

The hills of Europe are still covered with vineyards and orchards and the fertile fields are as productive as ever. The natural resources of Europe, the mines, the woodlands, the water powers, the transportation facilities, remain, and the facilities for manufacturing have been greatly increased since 1914 through the gigantic energies of five years of war which created more machinery than it destroyed. The man power and the woman power of Europe are capable of as great an output now as before the war. Before the war the people of Europe had loaned to us many billions of dollars, a large part of which we have repaid with interest, and we have extended credits to Europe during this World War through our Government ten billions of dollars, and since the war through our citizens more than five billions in addition. The European people as people are not bankrupt and they are not dishonorable. They are able to pay the United States and they will pay the United States in due time, principal and interest, but they can not at the present time pay either principal or interest because their industrial life has been disorganized through the demoralization following the war. They have neither gold nor sufficient commodities with which to make payment to the United States.

The one great outstanding factor breaking down confidence and destroying the validity and desirability of contracts in Europe is the violent inflation of currency through the printing press. In some of the countries of Europe people have been compelled to abandon the making of contracts in terms of currency and have resorted to the hopelessly clumsy system of barter—so many bushels of potatoes for so many bushels of corn or coal.

Neither the buyer nor the seller can afford to make a contract in a currency which, like the German mark, may shrink or expand 33 per cent within a month.

In Russia the ruble which sold two for a dollar before the war is now selling 50,000 rubles for a dollar. In Poland and Austria it is almost as bad, and in Germany the mark, formerly worth 23.8 cents, is now worth one-half a cent and a few weeks ago was worth one-third of a cent. The Italian lire, worth 19.3 cents before the war, is now worth less than 5 cents, and the French franc is now worth only 8 cents, and even the pound sterling, worth before the war $4.86, is now worth only $4.20, for the simple reason that even the pound sterling is not redeemable in gold and its exchange value is worth almost precisely what the pound sterling will buy in terms of gold bullion in the London market. The same thing is true, of course, as to the French franc, the German mark, and the Italian lire. If you buy bullion gold with these currencies in their own country you will find that what we call the exchange value of the franc, lire, or mark is measured by the purchasing power in gold of these currencies in their own country. And this, of course, is a necessary truism for the reason that the shipping of gold from these countries would immediately balance any exchange transaction and establish exchange at gold par. But they have little gold to spare and can not ship gold. They must sell their paper currency for gold or its equivalent in dollar exchange when paying us.

England in putting out the John Bradbury notes, which are English treasury notes used as currency, did so with a small gold reserve of between 12 and 13 per cent to maintain the credit of the Bradbury notes; but neither the Bradbury notes nor the Bank of England notes are subject to actual redemption in gold, and therefore they are at a discount measured in terms of gold.

In the same way the French franc under an issue of 38,000,000,000 francs, issued by the Bank of France (a private corporation but under Government control), has been diluted to a point where the Bank of France dared not redeem it in gold, and therefore the French franc has undergone a depreciation of 60 per cent. It is still worse with the Italian lira, and in the case of the German mark the mark went down to about 2 per cent of its original value.

How can manufacturers contract goods for future delivery in terms of marks when the mark at the time of future payment threatens a very high percentage of loss? How can merchants buy and sell with safety in terms of marks when the mark stretches from one value to another without notice?

In spite of this handicap the German people under the stimulation of their Government are nevertheless busily engaged in manufacturing, but under this very great disadvantage.

The one gigantic outstanding fact which retards rapid restoration of European industry and commerce is the lack of a stable gold-secured currency measurable in terms of gold. Even gold fluctuates in value, but at last it has been found by the nations of the world to be the most stable and acceptable measure of value ever established for monetary purposes.

The United States is able to provide a means for furnishing currency secured by gold and redeemable in gold and secured at the same time by staple merchantable commodities and underwritten by sound bankers' credits. I have submitted this bill which contains these fundamental principles, and which, if adopted, would establish a Federal reserve foreign bank owned by the Federal reserve banks of America, to function as their servant. Such a bank, with a primary capital of five hundred millions of gold taken from the Federal reserve banks, would not weaken the banking system of the United States for the reason that we have far in excess of the amount of gold required to keep our Federal reserve notes at par.

We have set apart 35 per cent of the reserve deposits in gold and legal tender. That 35 per cent is idle gold, unproductive and of no practical value, for the reason that the deposits are not capable of being withdrawn under the law. During the last 12 months, in spite of a withdrawal of deposits from national banks of over $2,000,000,000 and from State banks of over $1,000,000,000 the deposits in reserve banks have increased $13,000,000. Thirty-five per cent of $1,784,000,000, the present deposits in reserve banks, would make nearly $600,000,000 of idle gold and legal tender, and 25 per cent (the amount to which reserve against deposits is diminished) would make $446,000,000.

One billion seven hundred and eighty-four million dollars is the present deposit of reserves in the reserve banks. Thirty-five per cent of that is nearly $600,000,000 of gold and legal tender that is lying there, serving no useful purpose. That gold can be employed, though still owned by the reserve banks, through the Federal reserve foreign bank, and used as a basis of 20 per cent reserve would provide reserve notes amounting to $2,500,000,000, or five times the amount of such reserve gold. Under the bill I propose there would be 100 per cent of commodities behind each reserve bank note and 100 per cent of short-time bankers' bills. If the emission of these notes should go up to $2,500,000,000, there would be behind the bank notes 100 per cent of bankers' credits ($2,500,000,000), 100 per cent of commodity credits ($2,500,000,000), and 20 per cent of gold ($500,000,000), and we would in that way manufacture, if I may use such a term, a sound gold and commodity secured currency abundant to restore the European countries to a sound currency foundation.

At present they do not know what the value is of a mark, lire, kroner, lei, or a ruble. The mark has fluctuated 33 per cent in the last 30 days. It went down to one-third of a cent and back to half a cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator expect in his statement to show how it is possible to make the German mark worth 24 cents?

Mr. OWEN. I am not concerned in making the German mark worth 24 cents. It is impossible to make it worth 24 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. There are over 100,000,000,000 marks now outstanding.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; there are 103,000,000,000 marks outstanding at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. And more are being issued every day.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; they are pouring them out at the rate of a billion a week. So it is impossible for the German people to know how to make their contracts in terms of marks.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I interrupted the Senator was that I am compelled at this time to go to an important committee meeting. I wish I did not have to leave the Chamber, because I am anxious to hear what the Senator has to say. I desired to ask the question whether he had worked out any plan or whether there had been evolved in his mind a plan to set aside the present German paper mark and begin anew upon a gold basis. I thank the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I am not concerned with that. It is impossible for the American Government or the American people to interfere with the fiscal or currency affairs of the European countries. They have their own difficulties. It is not a question even for them of putting the German mark back to par. It is a far more important question. If they do put the German mark back to par, they must pay bonds in gold par at 23.8 cents that have been issued against the mark worth a half cent apiece, and then paying the bondholder, who bought those bonds measured in marks worth half a cent apiece, in marks worth 24 cents apiece; in other words, the bondholder receiving forty-eight times what he loaned to the Government of Germany. It is a very perplexing problem, and one that may take some years to work out, and will result eventually in a necessary compromise between the debtor and creditor classes affecting gigantic sums.

So I am not concerned with that difficult problem. What I am concerned with is that there shall be furnished to Europe a currency measured in grains of gold, a currency sufficient in volume to meet their industrial requirements. Under my plan the bank would earn 15 per cent on the $500,000,000 invested; assuming that $2,500,000,000 of notes would be loaned, it would bring a net income of approximately 3 per cent. It would earn about $75,000,000 a year, and setting apart 5 per cent on the capital for the benefit of the reserve banks they would take from that $75,000,000 the $25,000,000 of earnings per annum where they now get nothing at all. They complain that they put their deposits in the reserve banks and get no interest on the deposits, but under my proposal they would get $25,000,000 of earnings out of the idle gold which is tied up as a useless reserve behind the deposits.

But there is a far greater and more important reason for furnishing Europe with this gold-secured currency, and that is that Europe owes us $15,000,000,000 and she has neither gold nor commodities with which to pay us. However, she has the man power, she has the natural resources, she has the ingenuity and the brain and the brawn, and we are in a position, and we are the only nation in the world in a position, to furnish Europe with a gold-secured currency that will be adequate for them to base their contracts on and give stability to credits in their industrial and commercial life.

I am presenting this matter to the majority party and to the country. I do not expect to press the bill, because it is impossible for a minority Member successfully to press a bill of this magnitude and character. I know that. I concede that to start with. I offer this bill to the majority party because our common country could be served magnificently by this plan.

In connection with that we must also, I think, take into account the conditions in Europe with regard to the payment of principal interest on the sum they owe us and our nationals. I do not at all approve of the proposal made by various of our good citizens that we should remit this debt to Europe. It is not true that Europe is bankrupt. Europe is no more bankrupt than the United States is bankrupt. It has got the same fertile fields, the same vineyards, the same orchards; it has the same productive power; it has a greater productive power in machinery and in invention than it had before the war. It is true that the foreign indebtedness of Europe has grown to a gigantic sum, as in Germany, for instance; but it is also true that those Government liabilities are individual, personal assets of their own nationals who own the bonds, and they are neither better nor worse off as a people than they were before they issued those obligations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very sympathetically interested in what the Senator is saying, because, as he knows, I have introduced a bill which is along lines in some respects similar to those of his bill and has similar purposes. I do not fully understand, however, the details of the Senator's proposal. As I caught it, it is that the Federal reserve banks of the United States shall establish another bank?

Mr. OWEN. That they shall own the stock of a Federal reserve foreign bank.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that the stock issue should amount to $500,000,000?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; payable in gold.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Payable in gold, and that that bank should issue its currency against a gold reserve?

Mr. OWEN. That it should issue its bank notes as currency against bankers' bills, with short-time maturities, not exceeding 90 days, and against commodities that are staple, merchantable, insured, and covered by documents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not against a gold reserve?

Mr. OWEN. The 20 per cent gold reserve would be included.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator propose to limit the issue of currency to a percentage of the gold reserve?

Mr. OWEN. To 20 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What amount of currency does the Senator figure that would enable the bank to issue?

Mr. OWEN. It would enable the bank to issue twenty-five hundred million dollars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would require, then, a gold reserve of $500,000,000 on a 20 per cent basis?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, in that respect, is making the gold reserve very much less than the gold reserve required of the Federal reserve banks against the issue of currency?

Mr. OWEN. For the reason that when we deal with commodities that are worth the gold value of the notes and we have, in addition to that, 100 per cent of bankers' bills behind the notes, we need not fear about a 20 per cent reserve or getting the gold for redemption, because the commodities themselves are worth the gold, and in addition we have the bankers' short-time promise to pay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, that is also true in the case of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. OWEN. I am only justifying this proposal now; I am not criticizing the Federal reserve banks, although in their case I think we made the ratio of reserve much higher than was or is necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. OWEN. The Bank of England, I will say to the Senator, had a reserve as low as 8 per cent, without disturbing public opinion in England.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, will the Senator trace briefly the methods by which this gold and commodity-secured currency issued by the proposed bank would get into the financial channels of Europe?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. Here is a German potash manufacturer who wants to send $100,000 worth of potash to the United States for sale; he has a market for it, but he needs the accommodation of immediate credit when he handles the matter. He takes his potash and draws against it a bill which is indorsed by some member bank, we will say, the Reichsbank. It is a short-time obligation; he draws it payable in 60 days or 90 days. Then he gets $100,000 worth of Federal reserve foreign bank notes against that shipment of potash. The title to the potash passes into the hands of the Federal reserve bank or its agents.

If the obligation is not paid when it is due to be paid, first, the potash would pay for it, if sold by the agents of the bank; if it did not produce enough, then the banker who indorsed the bills would meet the difference; and if that did not meet it, still there would be the credit of the potash manufacturer and the shipper behind it. Those bank notes then would pass from hand to hand among the people and the banks. They would afford a form of currency that would enable people to deal with each other through this currency as a medium of exchange. They would not then have to exchange a bushel of potatoes for a bushel of corn or a bushel of coal nor deal in fluctuating marks or rubles. In eastern Europe the people are now using the principle of barter. What I am proposing is that we shall furnish them with bank notes that are the equivalent of gold, so many grains fine.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, let me ask the Senator another question. In that process, the potash producer in Germany has to get possession of $100,000 worth of the notes of the proposed bank?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The potash comes to the United States, and with it a draft for payment within 60 days.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The potash importer in the United States, at the end of 60 days, pays that draft?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What becomes of the $100,000 of currency which has been advanced to the German shipper?

Mr. OWEN. It circulates in Berlin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the bank in this country has received $100,000 in payment for the potash?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator considered the fact that the United States exports annually approximately $3,000,000,000 worth of products more than it imports?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How is it going to continue paying currency to Europe under those circumstances when upwards of $3,000,000,000 must be paid here in order to make up the excess of exports over imports?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will agree with me that as a mathematical principle the whole true balance of trade is equal to the sum of its several parts; and we may deal, therefore, with one transaction and inferentially determine what will be the result of a number of such transactions. Every single shipment, whatever it is, is balanced at the time it is made. There are certain invisible factors that enter into what we call the "balance of exchange." The "balance of exchange" really is a term which is often misleading, because the balance of exchange means a balance produced by adding up the figures of the imports and exports on the manifests of vessels arriving at and departing from the ports of a given country. We add those figures up, but we do not take into account the shipment of currency, the shipment of bonds, the shipment of stocks, the rendering of services through marine insurance, the rendering of services through trade on the ocean, the rendering of services by foreign countries to Americans who go into foreign countries and live there at the hotels and carry with them letters of credit, thus transmitting from this country abroad various credits.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I appreciate what the Senator says, but I think the present experience is that we are not only buying much less of Europe than we are selling to Europe, but the tide of investment is from this country into Europe at the present time rather than into the United States.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is true, and ought to be so to correct the differences in commodity exports.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the factors of which the Senator speaks are comparatively negligible. The fact is, after we have summed the whole thing up we find that Europe must pay us about $3,000,000,000 every year more than we pay Europe for what is bought.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator again that that is a fiction; it is not really true, and the reason it is not true is found in the factors entering the so-called "balance of trade," which are invisible and do not appear on the face of the record. When Europe buys $3,000,000,000 in excess of our commodities they pay in stocks, bonds, services, real estate, hotel bills, and so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My judgment is that those factors are more greatly in favor of the United States than against the United States. Our bankers are lending great sums of money practically to all foreign countries—to Brazil, to France, to Great Britain, to Norway, and to Sweden; to the cities and towns—and foreign nations are not lending anything over here at all.

Mr. OWEN. That temporarily offsets the "balance of trade" in our favor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The tide has now reversed, and we are actually lending a great deal more money to the remainder of the world than we are borrowing from other countries of the world. Therefore, the factors the Senator speaks of do not exist. The ultimate result is that there is a balance of $3,000,000,000 a year that we should receive from Europe above what we are paying to Europe. How can the Senator make that up? That is a difficulty that I have encountered in connection with my bill providing for a bank of nations. How can that great balance be overcome?

Mr. OWEN. I do not think the Senator followed clearly the observations made by me in regard to the balance of trade. The "balance of trade" relates to certain commodities only on the manifests of ships and is not a true balance of the financial and commercial exchanges; it never was and never will be at any time to come, for the reason that the balance of trade merely registers certain commodities on the ships' manifest and nothing more. It is only a commodity balance and nothing more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator that formerly it was not a true register—that is to say, that we were buying in Europe two or three thousand million dollars a year less than we were selling in Europe, and yet we were also paying to Europe great sums of interest—but we are not paying such interest now; that tide has been reversed; so that the conclusion the Senator reaches, while it would have been accurate before the war, it seems to me, does not apply now. Those factors of which he speaks have changed their course.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the "balance of trade," according to the figures of our statisticians, always has been and always will be the balance as shown on the ship manifests. It does not take into account the $10,000,000,000 that we loaned to Europe during the World War. Since the war we have loaned them $5,000,000,000 more, and that $5,000,000,000 is partly an offset to the so-called balance of trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I think the Senator is in error there; it makes the matter worse. Not only are we selling to Europe a great deal more than we buy from Europe, but we are lending to Europe, on top of that, a great amount of money, and they are not only obliged to pay us three thousand million dollars a year as the balance of trade, but they have got to pay us a thousand million dollars a year in interest.

Mr. OWEN. The amount that we lend to Europe does not appear in the "balance of trade," and we lend them part of the money required to balance the commodity "balance of trade"; that is a complete answer to the Senator. Every transaction balances itself at the time it is made. Of course, if I send 100 bales of cotton to Europe I get its equivalent in some form; I get it either in cash or in credit or in property on the other side of the water, but each transaction balances itself as of the day when made, and a million such transactions balance themselves.

The so-called "balance of trade" is never a balance but indicates the lack of balance of imports and exports and always represents an excess of exports or imports of goods.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Every transaction must balance itself or eventually difficulty would ensue, of course; but I want to ask the Senator now whether he proposes in his bill to redeem the notes that are to be issued by the proposed bank?

Mr. OWEN. Those notes will be taken up when the obligation is liquidated.

Mr. NORRIS. In the transaction to which the Senator referred in connection with potash——

Mr. OWEN. When the loan is paid back to the bank, the bank would get its notes or the equivalent in gold.

Mr. NORRIS. When the potash is sold here the bank, of course, gets the money in this country for it; but what process is gone through in order to redeem the notes that were originally issued in Europe for the potash?

Mr. OWEN. It would probably result in a credit where the transaction resulted in shipping over; but when you reverse that and an American ships into Berlin cotton of an equivalent amount, the cotton has to be paid for with these very notes, and the notes will come in to pay the bank the amount due to the bank for a New York credit extended the cotton shipper.

Mr. NORRIS. The foreign reserve bank, when it got the money for the potash on this side of the water, would not dare pay out that money. It would have to retain that money until it got possession of the original issue, and retired that; otherwise there would be inflation.

Mr. OWEN. That would be a credit in New York, and that credit would be used as a means of financing cotton shipped back to Germany. In other words, one hand would wash the other, and we would be furnishing a medium by which these transactions could be cleared; and that is the very purpose of this proposal. It is to furnish a convenient means of giving a stable medium of exchange to the European manufacturer and merchant, in order that they may create the commodities with which to pay America the amount that is due to America. They can not otherwise rapidly discharge their obligations; and I think in no event can we expect an immediate payment of the principal and interest of those amounts due to our Government, because of the demoralized condition of European industries.

I do not at all approve the idea of remitting to these European Governments their indebtedness to this country. It is not necessary to do it. They are not bankrupt. They are just as well able to pay their debts as we are able to pay our debts; and if we remit the indebtedness it would be exactly the same thing as taxing the wealth of America and presenting it as a gift to the wealth of Europe.

In order to adjust ourselves to the conditions in Europe, I think we ought to agree that the interest charges on the ten billions due to this Government should be postponed and merged into the principal for a period of time, say, 5 or 10 years. I think, moreover, that instead of charging Europe a very high rate of interest, we ought to agree that the rate of interest shall be what it was before the great World War—that is, 3 per cent. I say "3 per cent" because 3 per cent was the normal rate of interest in France and throughout western Europe before the war. The Bank of Netherlands, for instance, which is a great State bank, had a 3 per cent rate on loans for 50 years without a single break in that rate. The Bank of France would lend as small a sum as 5 francs for one year at a 3 per cent rate, and the rate of interest in the United States on a well-secured loan, such as a Government bond, was 3 per cent. Our 3 per cent bonds were at a premium before the war. The bankers do not average a rate of interest to their depositors exceeding 3 per cent. They have some running at 2 per cent and some at 4 per cent, but they do not average as high as 3 per cent interest on the deposits made with them; and, on the other hand, when a bank lends out its deposits it is content with less than 3 per cent as a margin of profit on its loans.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Unfortunately, I did not hear the early part of the Senator's explanation of his bill. When we realize and appreciate, as the Senator has stated, that the balance of trade, because of the $10,000,000,000 of loans and the $5,000,000,000 represented mainly by export commodities, operates to bring about a most unfavorable exchange condition so far as it relates to purchases from America, which condition we well understand to-day is interfering tremendously with our export business, I am interested to know, if the Senator can state briefly, how the operation of such a bank would to any considerable extent affect what I think is fundamental and what must be corrected before we can greatly increase our exports, namely, the condition of exchange to-day as it relates to purchases from America.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that what we now speak of as the rate of exchange really measures the selling price of a mark, franc, lira, kroner, or ruble in terms of gold. It all comes down at last to the gold value of those currencies. When you talk about exchange, commodity balances have ceased to cut any important figure in it, for the reason that if they could command gold and ship gold the rate of exchange would balance itself within two or three points, or what is called in normal times "the gold shipping point"; but they can not get gold with this depreciated currency, and they have not the commodities now to take the place of gold or to command gold.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not a matter of ordinary business realization that when you bid for anything—in other words, when there is a scarcity of any commodity or of money—the price is naturally higher? The existing condition of the balance of trade makes it necessary for the Frenchman or the Englishman or the representative of any other country, when he is compelled to pay for a bill of goods exported from this side, to bid all the higher simply because of that condition. It seems to me that that has its effect on exchange as much as any other possible thing.

Mr. OWEN. If you will take the present exchange rate of $4.20 on the pound sterling, which normally is $4.86, and take the present market value of gold in London, you will find that the exchange is fixed precisely by the purchasing power of gold by the paper money of England—the Bradbury notes. Gold is at a premium in London, and that premium measures the difference in the cost of the pound sterling.

Mr. EDGE. How does the Senator account for the very sudden fluctuations in British exchange and, in fact, in all other currency, ranging in the last six weeks from in the neighborhood of $3.75 or $3.80, as I recollect now, to $4.20, as the Senator states, on the pound sterling? I do not think there is any business condition to warrant it. I am wondering myself if the Senator has any answer beyond that of speculation.

Mr. OWEN. I think speculation does cut quite an important figure in it; and I think one of the important reasons for the passage of the bill I have introduced here is that by having a Federal reserve foreign bank you would have a natural stabilization of exchange on the basis of a reasonable commission and percentage for the services rendered; and in that way you would have a greater stability of exchange than if you had men who were buying and selling the pound sterling for profit.

Mr. EDGE. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that some type of an international bank—perhaps a combination of his ideas and the ideas expressed by the Senator from Nebraska—is absolutely essential and necessary to-day to have its influence on foreign trade and currency and exchange. I am free to admit, however, that I have not yet, as far as my little study of the situation permitted, found a way that I thought would greatly influence it. I think it will help, but not as much as an effort on the part of importers and exporters to equalize the balance of trade in a natural manner.

I agree that I do not like the idea of wiping out the $15,000,000,000 indebtedness. I never have. I hope it will not be necessary to bring about that condition. I do not believe it will be.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator may rest assured that five billions of it, at least, held by our private citizens will never be wiped out, and the statesman insane enough to try to tax America ten billions as a gift to the wealth of Europe will himself be wiped out.

Mr. EDGE. I have not a moment's hesitation in saying, however, that I believe that if the $15,000,000,000 of indebtedness were wiped out to-day there would be practically no difference in the rate of exchange between the countries.

Mr. OWEN. It would make no difference whatever at this time. It is the depreciated mark that measures the balance of exchange in Germany, the depreciated lira in Italy, and so forth.

Mr. EDGE. I am not prepared, however, to indorse that plan for one moment.

Mr. OWEN. It would not greatly serve the exchange at this time——

Mr. EDGE. I am not so sure of that.

Mr. OWEN. Because in reality, when you take the German mark, which before the war had an issue of two billions and now has an issue of one hundred and three billions, it is a question of the quantity of those marks, the facility of getting them, the fact that it is known now that they can not be redeemed in gold. It is just the quantitative theory over again. They have gone down from par to 2 per cent because the output has been multiplied fifty times.

Mr. EDGE. There is the answer, or one of the answers. If the Senator can evolve a plan, in connection with the organization of an international bank, whereby the directors of that bank will have a certain influence or control of the spread of currency, you might say, the issues of various countries that are to-day practically bankrupt, then I can see how such a bank would very rapidly and permanently rectify present conditions; but I am afraid that is almost impossible. That is practically the Ter Meulen plan, which we hear something about, and which has merit in it.

Mr. OWEN. The Ter Meulen plan is a different thing. It is a means by which to put a fixed income of a State expressed in bonds behind certain particular credits for the nationals of any particular country. It has its merits and the Ter Meulen bonds could be used as a basis of credit in any banks anywhere engaged in international banking.

Mr. EDGE. Such a bank, in my judgment, must have some control of the budgets of nations in order that their income and their outgo shall balance. It is necessary to balance the budget, as the term is usually used, and such a bank must also be able to control the printing press in the issue of currency, or no international bank, in my judgment, can ever have a great influence on exchange conditions, which in themselves influence trade.

Mr. OWEN. Of course the European Governments will have to balance their budgets. They will have also to quit using the printing press for the purpose of manufacturing unlimited paper currency. If they do not, their currency will become more and more depreciated, until it will not be worth more than the paper upon which it is printed. That, of course, is true; but in order to strengthen the revenues of the European countries it is of supreme importance that the people of those countries shall be employed in profitable industry. I am proposing a plan that will enable them to make contracts that have a stable value under them. At present they have a fluctuating currency. I am proposing a currency which will not fluctuate more than the value of gold fluctuates, and therefore if my plan is adopted these European countries will be in a position to increase their revenues and to balance their budgets. They will be in a position to employ their people profitably in peaceful industry. That is the very purpose of the proposal that I am making. It will help them to balance their budgets. It will teach them the folly of using the printing press to turn out paper money, because this currency I propose will be sufficient for the people. It will be sound and clean and based on gold and commodities worth gold. Therefore it will give them a sound currency. If I may say so, the currency blood of their commerce will be clean, will be worth gold; and America is the only country in the world that can furnish it.

I think we ought to fix a 3 per cent rate on these European loans. I think we ought to allow the interest to merge into the principal for 5 or 10 years; and I think at the same time in the United States we ought to determine upon the policy of postponing the payment of our own war debt for a longer period of time. That at the same time we are relieving Europe of paying the present interest on these debts we ought to relieve the American people of the sinking fund against the war debt for a like period, because it can all be made up when Europe is back again on its feet and in a productive position.

As I said in the beginning, I am presenting this plan for the consideration of Senators, especially of the majority party. It is a very important suggestion. It is based on the principles of the Federal reserve act. The principles are absolutely sound; they have been demonstrated to be sound.

Senators, you have it in your power to adopt a plan that will restore the industrial life of the world, and I am presenting it, with such earnestness as I may, in the hope that patriotism and public spirit will induce Senators to study this proposal I have made, and I trust you will take so much of merit as you may find in it and make it available for the service of mankind.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I understood, the limit of the issuance of circulating notes under that system would be about two billion five hundred million?

Mr. OWEN. It would.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator think that would be sufficient to accomplish what he aims at?

Mr. OWEN. It is abundant. The total issue of currency now in Germany, with 80,000,000 people, is only worth $500,000,000 gold, and that is an amount five times as great.

Mr. KING. A hundred billion marks then would be worth only about $500,000,000 in gold?

Mr. OWEN. That is true at half cent a mark.

Mr. FLETCHER. What the Senator suggests might do for Germany, but how about the whole of Europe?

Mr. OWEN. Germany has 80,000,000 people, in round numbers, and five times 80,000,000 is 400,000,000, and there are only 300,000,000 in Europe. If $500,000,000 is enough for the German people, $2,500,000,000 is enough for Europe. I have covered that sufficiently. It will furnish an abundance. I think there ought to be authority for the European nations to take over this bank or its branches at the proper time, when they are in position to do it. The United States reserve banks need not want to carry on these banks if the other countries will take them over.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was wondering also what had been accomplished under what is known as the Edge Act, which authorized national banks to get together and establish banks in foreign countries.

Mr. OWEN. The trouble is that commerce is languishing. Commodities are not being manufactured in sufficient quantity. Commerce is impaired by the demoralization caused by the World War, and I am proposing a plan now by which to restore the industrial activity of Europe.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I was called from the Chamber, and possibly the question I have in mind has been explained; but if so, I did not hear what the Senator said about it. Does the Senator's plan contemplate some action by the several European Governments whereby they would aid in availing themselves of this system?

Mr. OWEN. It contemplates no action on the part of any European Government at all.

Mr. POMERENE. I believe that under what is known as the Gresham law cheaper money always drives dearer money out of circulation.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator for making that suggestion, because it is in point. That would be true if you had gold circulating side by side with paper money, where the people might pay their debts in either one or the other. They would pay their debts in the cheaper money, and the gold would go into hiding; but in this case there would be no competition between the Federal reserve foreign bank notes and the mark, for instance, for the reason that these bank notes would be the equivalent of gold, and they could not go into hiding for the reason that behind every note is a hundred per cent of commodities worth the gold face value of the notes, and bankers' credits of 100 per cent more behind these notes worth the face value of the notes. Therefore they could not go into hoarding.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not questioning the security of the bank planned.

Mr. OWEN. That would be the point of the suggestion of the Gresham law.

Mr. POMERENE. My thought was that perhaps the principle of the Gresham law might apply, and, if so, there would be a temptation to hoard the Federal reserve bank notes, and if that were done, then a given amount of bank notes would not give the same assistance to the commerce of these foreign countries. That was the thought I had in mind. In other words, if they should be retired, you could not get the same service from that kind of a circulation that you would get if they were kept in circulation.

Mr. OWEN. That is true, and if the Gresham law did apply, what the Senator says is absolutely true, that it would render nugatory the service proposed to be rendered by these notes; it would nullify the proposal; but they can not be withdrawn, because they are actually covered by 100 per cent of commodities, and they are covered by 100 per cent of bankers' credits besides, and it is a short-time note that is behind these reserve bank notes.

Mr. POMERENE. It may be true that it is a short-time note that is back of the reserve notes, but I am trying to trace these reserve notes themselves to see what is going to happen to them.

Mr. OWEN. The reserve notes would be called for to liquidate the indebtedness incurred.

Mr. POMERENE. These reserve notes might not be in the hands of the debtor.

Mr. OWEN. The banker gets these reserve bank notes. He owes the exact amount of the reserve bank notes. He has to pay it in 60 days, we will say.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; but if a manufacturer over there gets his reserve notes, and in the conduct of his commercial affairs turns part of them over to me and part to some one else, it being a better class of currency, I might be disposed to hoard them.

Mr. OWEN. The bank would have to pay them in gold if they should be hoarded.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rather agree with what the Senator from Ohio has said, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to an answer which he made to me. He instanced a case in which a potash producer in Germany received for his shipment of potash $100,000 in the notes of this bank, and he said that when the potash was shipped to this country the potash user in this country would, after 60 days, say, pay in American money for the potash which he purchased.

Mr. OWEN. You may say gold.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whatever you please. Meanwhile the $100,000 of the notes of the bank are in Germany; they are currency.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; the corresponding gold would be in New York.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me there would be some likelihood, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, that one of the difficulties of the situation would be that the holders of those notes would be apt to hang on to them and hoard them, just as at the present time they are hoarding American money. It is notorious, as has been said by German writers, that while certain people in the United States have been buying German currency and German credits with the idea that they will advance, many Germans have been buying American currency in order to make themselves secure, and it seems to me that there would be a likelihood of a good deal of that currency going out of circulation.

Mr. OWEN. It would go into circulation. It would be in the pockets of people and passing around for their common use. Take the potash example, for instance. One hundred thousand dollars of those notes would go right into the hands of the people.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let us assume that the potash manufacturer in Germany has deposited his full $100,000 of currency of this bank in his own bank in Germany. In his own domestic transactions he can use the German money just as well as he can use that money, and there is no reason why that German bank, if it wants to keep a reserve, should send it over here for redemption. It can keep the notes there just as well. It is just as much of a reserve for that bank to keep. It seems to me it would be the tendency of that superior class of currency to go into hiding.

Mr. OWEN. It would not be in hiding; it would be in actual use, and that is exactly what I wanted to say, because under those circumstances the banker or the potash manufacturer could say, "I want to make a contract with you to buy $100,000 worth of additional potash, and I have the gold or its equivalent available in my bank. I have it here ready to use now. I have shipped $100,000 worth of potash, and I have $100,000 of gold or the equivalent of gold, and I want to use that to buy some more potash, or buy some more labor, or whatever goes into the production of it."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He would naturally use German money.

Mr. OWEN. He might use some of these notes to buy German money if he wanted to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If he did, the people who received those would naturally save them, because they would know they would be as good as gold, and they would float the German marks in their place. I believe that is a possibility.

Mr. OWEN. At the last, the banker who got the accommodation owes this money, and he has to pay it in gold or in the equivalent of gold, and these notes are the equivalent of gold, and it would make certain a demand on his part to get the gold. But, of course, I am assuming that this bank would expand and that there would be twenty-five hundred million of these dollars in circulation in a great variety of ways, infinitely various, so that no human mind can trace them, but that at last this bank always has the bank credits of 100 per cent behind these notes, and it always has commodities of gold value to the extent of 100 per cent, and it has always 20 per cent in actual gold in its own vaults. That security is enough. It is 220 per cent against every note at the bank, and it would be only a bank note at last.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disposed to dispute the Senator's statement that the security is ample. I want to call his attention to another matter. He has instanced the case of a European exporter being paid through this bank for the products which he exports to the United States. There is no difficulty about that at the present time. The man in Germany has no difficulty in getting credit for what he exports to the United States; there is no difficulty about that at the present time. The man in Germany has no difficulty in getting paid for what he exports to the United States, the man in France has no difficulty, and the man in Great Britain has no difficulty. The real difficulty is when the American undertakes to export to Europe; then there is a difficulty in getting payment. Will the Senator reverse his process and illustrate how the bank which he proposes would pay the American for the shipments which he makes to Europe when the European is in no position to make payments?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; take this hundred thousand dollars which the Federal reserve foreign bank has in New York against the shipment of a hundred thousand dollars' worth of potash. A man comes up and says, "I want to ship a hundred thousand dollars' worth of cotton to Berlin." The banker or the Federal reserve foreign bank says: "All right; put your cotton on board. Draw your bill against Berlin. Have it underwritten by the Equitable Trust Co. of New York, and I have a hundred thousand dollars against the shipment of this potash which I will turn over to you." In due course of time it will come over to Berlin and be paid by the German people, and the German people will then have this hundred thousand dollars of currency now available to pay it with.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me stop the Senator right there. How are the banks in Germany to make the payment for this shipment?

Mr. OWEN. By using these very bank notes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have gone into circulation; you do not know that the banks have them. They may be hoarded.

Mr. OWEN. I never heard of anything in the shape of money in circulation the banks did not get their hands on eventually.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Assuming that the theory is correct that the identical hundred thousand dollars in notes which have been sent to Germany will pay for this shipment of cotton, that will be all right, providing our shipments to Germany are no greater than Germany's shipments to the United States. But assume the case where shipments from Germany to the United States are much less than the shipments from the United States to Germany. Then what would be done?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is asking me to finance an impossible case. If the German people can not ship enough commodities to the United States to pay for the commodities shipped from the United States to Germany and have no other means of paying, they must stop shipping from the United States, and that is precisely what has happened to our foreign commerce. They have quit buying in such quantities.

But, as I said to the Senator before, each individual case will adjust itself. When I ship to Germany I say to them that they are going to be paid, and I have good security. When a German ships to the United States he does the same thing, and these balances of trade you speak of need not worry us, because each transaction will take care of itself; but it is true at last that you will have trade languish unless the people of one country are able to manufacture and export commodities of equal value to their imports. They must have their exports and their imports at last practically balance. I think that is undoubtedly true, and I think that is the idea the Senator is desiring to impress. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator. I have run up against exactly the same difficulty with my bill that I think he encounters with his bill, the difficulty of making payment where the country which makes the payment has not been able and is not able to export sufficient manufactured goods or products of one sort or another for that purpose.

Mr. OWEN. I am proposing to extend them a financial accommodation in a gold-secured currency to the extent that they require in order to enable them to restore their industries and manufactories and increase their commodities for export.

They can only pay their debts in the products of their labor, in commodities. I am proposing to help them pay their debts to us by helping them restore their industries through the use of a stable and gold-secured currency.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is exactly what I am trying to do in my bill, but I find considerable difficulty, and I am anxious to hear the Senator explain it as fully as possible.

Mr. OWEN. To recapitulate, or, perhaps, to repeat in some degree, I may say that by the last report the Federal reserve banks had two million nine hundred and ninety-three millions of gold and legal tender, making approximately two billions nine hundred and fifty millions net gold.

Taking away five hundred million of this gold and putting it subject to the redemption of the bank notes of the Federal reserve foreign bank would give, with a 20 per cent gold reserve against such rates, a gold-secured currency available for Europe of twenty-five hundred millions, which would be enough to serve their commerce and industry, and make a profit to the banks of the United States until Europe should be restored to a normal condition. Germany, for example, measuring its present mark currency of one hundred and three billions at a half a cent per mark would have a gross currency value of about five hundred million dollars, which would be enough if it had a stable value. The bank I propose could supply this amount of gold-secured currency which would suffice to supply the manufacturers and merchants with an amount adequate for their needs, and twenty-five hundred million dollars would be an abundance to provide Europe with all the gold-secured currency imperatively necessary for the restoration of its industries.

Withdrawing five hundred millions from the present American gold reserve would still leave twenty-four hundred millions of gold and legal tender behind Federal reserve notes of two billion four hundred and forty-seven million in actual circulation which at present happens to be about 100 per cent.

The Federal reserve system provided for a 35 per cent reserve in gold or lawful money against the reserve deposits of the member banks, and these deposits, amounting to seventeen hundred millions, require a gold deposit of over five hundred millions in gold, notwithstanding these deposits are fixed by statute law, can not be withdrawn, and do not fluctuate substantially. A year ago the deposits of the twelve reserve banks, December 23, 1920, amounted to $1,771,000,000. On December 21, 1921, these deposits amounted to $1,784,000,000, an increase of $13,000,000, although the loans and discounts, including open-market purchases and acceptances, had decreased $1,621,630,000.

It is an absolute waste of five hundred millions of gold to keep it tied up as a reserve against the reserve deposits. The principle of keeping a reserve against a deposit which is subject to withdrawal from a member bank is totally different from a reserve held against reserve bank deposits, because a member bank may have all of its deposits withdrawn and a member bank has no means of making payment with Federal reserve notes obtained from the Government as with the Federal reserve banks. But even a member bank which is carefully managed should be able to go through a complete liquidation within a reasonably short time under our reserve system, and it would be impossible to embarrass the reserve banks by the failure of one or more member banks.

So that without diminishing the amount of gold behind the Federal reserve notes, the United States could establish the Federal reserve foreign bank with five hundred millions of free gold, and, therefore, furnish Europe with twenty-five hundred millions of gold secured currency.

The Federal reserve foreign bank under the plan proposed would not issue Federal reserve notes, but would issue Federal reserve bank notes, based on a minimum of 20 per cent actual gold and 100 per cent of short-time qualified commercial bills based on actual staple merchantable commodities, such bills being secured by documents and underwritten by member banks. Any bank authorized to do business with the Federal reserve foreign bank would be designated for this purpose a member bank.

In Europe the people are accustomed to bank notes. The Bank of England note is a bank note and, although the note of a private corporation, is made legal tender by law. The notes of the Bank of France and of the Reichbank of Germany are legal-tender notes, although bank notes, and comprise the volume of the currency of France and Germany, respectively.

The franc and the mark being legal tender, the people who transact business with each other promise to pay in francs and marks, and when the franc and mark go down from par those who belong to the creditor class suffer and those who belong to the debtor class gain. A man who at the beginning of the war owed 100,000 marks worth at that time gold par could liquidate the debt now for one-fiftieth part of the same value in gold.

This is ruinous to the bond-holding class whose bonds are payable in marks. It accounts for the tremendous fluctuation in the price of stocks which represent part ownership in certain properties, because the properties having actual gold value increase in terms of marks as the marks go down in gold value.

Mr. President, I do not think it desirable that I should comment upon the wisdom or unwisdom of the German Government in expanding the marks to such a gigantic volume. It is sufficient to point out the fact of this inflation, its interruption to the stability of credits, and its eventual depressing influence on industrial life. While on a rising market there may be for a while a feverish activity to manufacture and sell goods against a rising market, eventually the discovery is made that it is an illusion and the collapse must come. We have already experienced our depression, have reached the bottom in nearly all lines of commodities, and are now reacting from it.

It is obviously impossible that the German people, the Poles, the Austrians, or Russians will ever pay in gold the debts contracted in paper money. Some compromise must be effected between the debtor and creditor class at which the mark, the kronen, the lei, and the ruble shall have a fixed gold value for purposes of adjustment, unless, indeed, with the ruble the whole bad business is repudiated. But with a depreciated and fluctuating currency business men are almost paralyzed. The distress and disorganization of business will not end until a sound currency is made available.

Mr. President, it is not enough to provide a means by which Europe can get a gold currency for the use of their manufacturers and merchants. Under the present disorganized condition of Europe they can not at this time pay back to the United States the principal or interest of the debts due our Government and our nationals in gold or in commodities. They have not the gold, and their manufacture of commodities is greatly hampered by the conditions which I have described.

Quite a few of our citizens in distinguished positions have so keenly realized the disorganization of Europe and the extreme poverty of the poorer classes that they have been led to the belief and have advocated that the people of the United States should forgive the debt due by the people of Europe. It is a generous impulse. I sympathize with the high motive that actuates those who make the suggestion. They believe it would attach the people of Europe to the people of the United States and that it would have a future moral and financial consequence that would fully justify the cancellation of the debt.

I do not agree to this for the very simple reason that while it is true that the poverty of the poorer classes in Europe is very great, it is also true that the wealth of the wealthy classes of Europe is very great and I am not willing to tax the wealth of the United States and of our people with the effect of conveying that amount of property to the wealthy classes of Europe.

As I have heretofore stated, the material resources of Europe remain; the productive power of the people of Europe is greater now than it was in 1913, provided only their industries were properly organized and in full motion.

The very great bond issues put out by the European Governments are held by their own people, and these Government debts are private assets and neither add to nor take from the power of the European people, as such, to pay the amount which they borrowed from us. Their Governments borrowed from us ten billions and our country expended in the war over forty billions. The war cost us thirty billions net outside of what we advanced to Europe, and this war was brought on through the acts, through the sins of omission and the sins of commission of the European statesmen. We were finally besought to come to the protection of the more democratic European people who were about to be overthrown and subjugated by the evil forces which they had permitted to grow up in their midst.

While I do not agree that we should remit this debt or the interest upon it, I do think that we ought to make the most important concessions. We ought to agree to withhold for 5 or 10 years a demand for the present payment of interest on the amount due the United States by the foreign Governments and let it be added to the principal. We ought to lower the rate of interest on this indebtedness to 3 per cent because 3 per cent is a fair rate of interest on a secured debt. I say it is a fair rate because 3 per cent was the unbroken rule of interest charged by the Bank of Netherlands for 50 years without an exception previous to the World War; because France had a 3 per cent rate of interest with very few exceptions for decades before the war, and because our 3 per cent bonds before the war were at a premium, and because the American bankers pay their depositors less than an average of 3 per cent, and the American bankers are content to make less than 3 per cent on the average of their deposits in lending the deposits out and taking the responsibility of the loans.

Even during the World War London merchants got money on acceptances at 3½ per cent, and call money now in London is under 3 per cent, and because call money in normal times, as in February, 1908, to December, 1908, averaged between 1½ per cent and 3 per cent, as it did in 1909. It averaged under 3 per cent during 1910 and 1911, and before the World War, in 1914, from January to July it averaged under 2 per cent, and even during 1915 and 1916 it was very low, until we got into the war.

The European people are not bankrupt either financially or morally. They will pay their debts honorably and in due time, but America ought to go as far as reason and justice requires in lowering the rate of interest, in giving time, and in extending financial cooperation and credit to enable Europe to make effective its man power and material resources.

I have said that the European people were not bankrupt for the simple reason that their material resources and man power, their brain and brawn, remain unimpaired, and while it is true that the Governments of Europe have permitted the currency to be impaired in purchasing power by emission of paper currency in excess of what could be redeemed in gold, nevertheless whatever this currency is and whatever the bonded indebtedness may be already issued by the European Governments, the European people hold as individual assets almost every dollar of these Government liabilities, and in appraising the wealth and the wealth-producing power of Europe it must be remembered that these national liabilities are individual assets.

I am not willing, Mr. President, to have the wealth of America taxed in the interest of contributing to the wealth of Europe, and Europe must recognize its obligation to tax its own wealth just as we have taxed our wealth in this country to meet its national obligations.

All Europe must acknowledge the rights of private property and provide the means of giving private property prompt, sure protection.

The European nations must balance their budgets, and will undoubtedly do so as soon as the world reaches an understanding with regard to the limitation of armaments on sea and land, and as soon as the nations have an understanding, whether express or implied, that they will use their combined energies to protect the territorial integrity of unoffending nations against the invasion or aggression of outlaw nations.

With the destruction of the military dynasties the world has but little reason to anticipate in future wicked wars of aggression.

The European nations must stop the unlimited issue of paper money and bring their currency back to gold par. This is a problem of gigantic importance and of the most serious difficulties dealing with the bonded indebtedness of these nations measured in terms of a depreciated currency. It can only be done by the most resolute and clear-cut purpose and will involve compromises between the debtor and creditor classes involving amounts that are gigantic. We need not wait for this compromise to be effected, for other remedies are available.

Mr. President, in the event that the United States does postpone the payment of the interest on the European debt for the next 5 or 10 years, and if we extend the time of the payment of the principal of the European debt for 50 years, we ought at the same time to postpone the payment of the bonded indebtedness of the United States for at least a like period and waive the collection of a sinking fund for the next 5 or 10 years in order to relieve the American people of some part of the gigantic burden of taxes imposed by this World War.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the suggestions which I wish to make are as follows:

First. That we should postpone the final payment of the World War debt in the United States by extending the payment over 50 years; that we should not for 10 years collect any amount for a sinking fund.

Second. That in arranging the payment of Europe's debt to the United States we should extend time to Europe necessary to enable them to readjust their affairs and regain their productive power, and that we should not for 10 years demand of them the payment of the interest due, but allow it to merge into the principal.

Third. That we should put the interest rate at 3 per cent on the European debt to the United States.

Fourth. That we should establish a Federal reserve foreign bank through which might be emitted twenty-five hundred million dollars of gold-secured Federal reserve foreign bank notes having 100 per cent commodity bills and banking credits behind such notes; such notes subject to redemption in gold at New York, London, and Paris only, and then only to member banks.

The Gresham law could not apply to these reserve bank notes, for the very sound reason that every one of these notes would have behind it 100 per cent of commodity bills worth the gold on the market, and moreover would have sound bankers' credit worth the amount of such notes in the market, and moreover would have 20 per cent of actual gold, so that anybody able to buy gold at all could buy it with these commodities and bankers' credits and need not cash the reserve bank notes as a means of getting gold. It would not be the same as putting gold in circulation side by side with depreciated paper money, because to get these notes you have got to pay the full value in gold in terms of commodities and bankers' credit, and it would be just as easy to buy gold under these circumstances as to buy and redeem the bank notes.

The value of the proposed note is that it furnishes in the most convenient possible form a currency redeemable in gold and worth gold, and, therefore, becomes a medium of exchange with which the European people, the manufacturers and merchants and business men, can measure their contracts and know what they are doing when they enter into a contract.

I have drawn this bill in the hope that some of the Senators of the party in power would approve its principles and take it and perfect it by putting it under the microscope and use its sound principles in order that the people of Europe who owe us fifteen thousand millions of dollars may be put in a position where they can repay what they owe us. Our industrial and commercial prosperity is most intimately bound up with the happiness and prosperity of the European people. If they can not buy our goods we suffer; if we can not buy their goods they suffer. If their industrial life is disorganized so that they can not buy from us our foreign commerce languishes.

We have already seen our foreign commerce fall off over three thousand million dollars this year. We find goods piling up in excess, and men burning corn in the West, while the Russian people die for the lack of corn.

The world is entering into a new era. The great military dynasties have been overthrown. The Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Romanoffs have followed the Bourbons. The world enters a new democratic era. The Conference at Washington on the Limitation of Armaments has already had a profound effect on the world. It will not only cut down the gigantic taxes which would have ensued from the rivalry among the nations in building warships, but it will lead to a limitation of land armaments. The increasing intelligence of the people of the world will no longer permit statesmen to be led by vanity and ambition into the slaughter of the peoples of the earth.

A new era has been born, an era of peace, of industrial life, of new industrial activity, of new powers of production, and the great war debts in 25 years from now will be liquidated far more easily than they are now, not only because of the increasing power of man to harness the forces of nature and create values, but because men have learned how to create credits and to make money available to those who are entitled to it. We have demonstrated this in the Federal reserve act; in the farm loan act; in the War Finance Corporation; in the Liberty loan drives, where we turned over to Uncle Sam forty billions of dollars of credits in a few short months.

Under the Federal reserve act since 1913 there has been a very large expansion of credits, notwithstanding the contraction which has taken place under the pressure of the last year and a half.

The payment of the war debt will be much easier on the people by postponing it a few years, because their productive power is increasing year by year. I therefore pray, Mr. President, that the members of the majority party who are charged with the administration of government shall consider the suggestions which I have had the honor to make, and if there be credit arising from the principles and plan I propose, let the party in power take the full credit. I shall be more than content if what I have proposed may be of service to the country and the world and assist the party in power to meet the reasonable hopes and expectations of the American people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OWEN. I yield the floor, unless the Senator wishes to ask me a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. EDGE. I simply rose to answer the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who, in addressing a question to the Senator from Oklahoma, asked what had been accomplished under the act which provided for the incorporation of banks doing an international business, sometimes called the Edge Act.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just going to suggest that that ought to be done.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the better plan would be to let the Senator from New Jersey discuss the unfinished business, and then we could lay it aside when he completes his statement and at that time take up the calendar. If we do not do that, there will be nothing before the Senate to discuss.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. I will say that I shall occupy the floor not more than two minutes.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw the request in order that the bill which is the unfinished business may be pending before the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. I may direct the attention of the Senator from Florida to this fact: The bank organized under that act in New Orleans with a capital, as I recall, of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000, with a turnover, as provided under the act, of ten times the capital, which would be $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, has been used to a very large extent by the War Finance Corporation in connection with the exportation of cotton. I think that several hundred thousand bales—I can not tell the exact amount involved, running in value into hundreds of thousands of dollars—have been exported and the matter has been entirely financed by that institution.

I might state, however, a fact which I think we will all realize if we stop for a moment to consider it, that the period since the act referred to became a law has not been very propitious for the organization of financial institutions. It is rather a difficult matter, no matter how favorable the work or the possibilities of such an institution would be in normal times, to sell stock to-day in a new institution where we can not promise in an ordinary way a return of perhaps more than 5 or 6 or 7 per cent, when any investor can go into the open market and buy the best of securities with a return sometimes of 8 or 9 or even 10 per cent.

So it is, of course, natural that we must wait until conditions become more normal, speaking generally, in the business world before we can organize new institutions. However, this one in New Orleans was organized very largely through the combination of the small banks of the State, and my information is that they have been enjoying a very prosperous business.

My belief is that when we can reach a solution such as that which has been discussed this morning by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], whereby exchange can be brought back to somewhere near its normal condition, where foreign Governments or buyers can be induced to buy our products without being compelled to pay such a tremendous premium in meeting their bills for the same, we will find the number of banks organized under the so-called Edge Act will be very adequate, because it is a natural enlargement of the American banking system, as we now realize the country depends upon it. It is a natural enlargement to an international broadening viewpoint whereby we can take advantage of the markets of the world.

So the mere fact that during the last three years, in the attempt to get back to normal conditions, these banks have not materialized throughout the country, should not in any way discourage us. Just as the Federal reserve system and our National and State banks have taken care of the upbuilding of America and of the various requirements in local communities, building factories, and developing local industries, so these banks should ultimately take care of the international situation. I think Congress may be entirely satisfied with the passage of the act which made it possible.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that what I had in mind was that the present proposal by the Senator from Oklahoma is, of course, very much more far-reaching than the law which we call the Edge Act. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to be very friendly to that act and that he had some considerable part in its enactment. I think there ought to be, and would be, a very considerable chance of accomplishing the financing and settling of exchange rates, and so forth, in foreign countries if the bankers would take advantage of the provisions of the act. My recollection is it would permit the establishment of branches. May I ask the Senator if that is not true?

Mr. EDGE. That is entirely correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. If under that system branch banks were established in Germany and elsewhere and the whole system put into operation, it seems to me the banks themselves could accomplish a very great deal in the direction that is aimed at by the new proposal of creating an international currency. I do not think they could go as far as that, of course. We would not have the power to issue and circulate notes, I take it. I am not sure about that, but I think not. However, if they followed out the provisions of that law and organized and created these branches, unquestionably they could take care to a very large extent, it seems to me, of our financial demands, and it would go far toward stabilizing exchange.

Mr. EDGE. I did not hear the explanation of the Senator from Oklahoma as to how the capital stock would be disposed of in order to incorporate the banking institution which he proposes. If through the medium of private purchase or private investment, of course, it would face the same difficulty that the bank organized under the act we are now discussing naturally faces. If, however, his plan proposes a certain Government aid or assistance in furnishing the capital stock for the bank, of course, that is quite different.

The difficulty to-day with the bank proposed under the international banking act is the fact that the stock must be sold entirely to private people or corporations, and the Government in no way, shape, manner, or form assists. As I understand the plan of the Senator from Oklahoma, he proposes more or less Government aid, which, of course, is quite a different matter.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with the order of business where we left off when the calendar was last under consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator advise the Senate as to the number at which he proposes to begin?

Mr. CURTIS. Calendar No. 210.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will state the first bill to be considered under the unanimous consent.

The bill (S. 943) for the relief of John Lyons was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, are we proceeding under unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are. On objection the bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1976) to amend the first paragraph of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1790) to place national guardsmen who entered the World War otherwise than through the draft on equal basis as to longevity and continuous-service pay with national guardsmen who were drafted was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1075) giving permanent rank to district superintendents of the Coast Guard on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

INVESTIGATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

The resolution (S. Res. 115) directing an investigation of the administration of the Federal reserve system and the office of the Comptroller of the Currency was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the resolution be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution, which was submitted by Mr. MCLEAN July 22, 1921, and reported by Mr. MCCORMICK July 22, 1921, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the administration of the Federal reserve system and of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency and to report its findings to the Senate with such recommendations as it deems proper. For the purposes of this resolution the committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance, to meet at such times and places and to sit during the session and recesses of the present Congress, to have such printing and binding done, to make such expenditures for traveling, and to make such other expenditures as it deems necessary. The committee or any subcommittee thereof is further authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony. The President of the Senate is authorized, upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof, to issue subpœnas for such purposes, and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is directed to serve such subpœnas. Any person who willfully refuses to obey any such subpœna and any witness guilty of contumacy shall be liable to penalties provided in section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. All expenses of the committee or any subcommittee thereof incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee, signed by the chairman thereof.

Mr. KING. May I inquire if there is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency present?

Mr. FLETCHER. I happen to be a member of that committee. I am not the chairman of the committee, however. I do not know very much about this particular resolution, but it was reported from the committee, and I can see no objection to its passage. At the same time I am not acquainted with the facts sufficiently to urge the reasons or the necessity for its passage.

Mr. KING. Let it go over, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

JOHN LYONS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the bill (S. 943) for the relief of John Lyons, being the first bill called on the calendar, came up, I made objection to its consideration, not being advised then, as I have been since, of the nature of the measure. I ask now that we may recur to that bill and that it may be taken up for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, John Lyons, who was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that company and regiment, but that no back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That measure is the unfinished business and has already been temporarily laid aside.

The bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I had understood that that measure had been considered and disposed of some time ago.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is another measure similar to the one which the Senator from Utah has in mind.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

CLARENCE L. REAMES.

The bill (S. 2356) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the bill will go over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah has had sufficient time to look into the merits of this claim since it was last before the Senate. My former colleague, Senator Chamberlain, introduced the bill here a year ago or more. It has been reported favorably. It has every merit to warrant quick and favorable action upon it; but it has been passed over again and again when reached on the calendar.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Oregon that I have not the facts directly in mind, but, perhaps a year ago, I recall giving some little attention to the bill. As I recall from my investigation at that time the bill proposed to provide extra compensation in behalf of a district attorney. I objected to the bill then because I thought its passage would establish a bad precedent. I think that where a man accepts a position under the Government for a stipulated salary he ought not to receive additional compensation unless there are some remarkable or extraordinary circumstances attending the work which he is called upon to perform. The Senator from Oregon can see that if we establish a policy of allowing extra compensation thousands of employees will find that they have performed work perhaps outside of the general line of their employment and they will find excuses to present claims to Congress for additional compensation. I think the passage of such a measure would afford a dangerous precedent.

If there is anything which differentiates this case from the general rule that employees of the Government without extra compensation should perform all the work which was reasonably contemplated as being within their employment, I shall be very glad to obtain the information. Otherwise I shall feel constrained to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I desire to say that this case was considered by the Committee on Claims when I was the chairman of that committee, and I am glad to say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the facts in the case are substantially these: The beneficiary of the bill was a district attorney in Oregon, but the Government having some cases of great importance to try in California, quite beyond the jurisdiction of the district attorney in question, sent him from eastern Oregon down to California to try those cases. There was a certain per diem allowance for expenses, but not anywhere near enough to meet his actual expenses.

The district attorney from Oregon saved the Government the expense of employing additional counsel, but he was himself out of pocket because of these cases which he then tried. The Department of Justice looked into the matter and recommended to the committee that the claimant was entitled to approximately $2,000 because of the length of time, running through many weeks, during which he was engaged in these extra official duties so far as his district was concerned. That is the amount for which this compensation is asked.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the $2,000 is for the purpose of allowing him additional compensation or merely to cover the expenses to which he was put in the discharge of the duties devolving upon him in California?

Mr. SPENCER. It is for both purposes. The amount covers the expense to which he was put, and which he paid out of his own pocket; but the testimony before the committee, as I recall, is also to the effect that some of it was for extra compensation. The Senator from Utah, being a lawyer of wide practice, knows that the amount of compensation for trying cases of such importance was probably negligible, as the whole amount involved is but $2,000. The attorney was engaged in cases of tremendous importance and for a great length of time, yet my recollection is that all of the claim is not merely for expenses.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall feel constrained to object to the consideration of this bill unless there shall be eliminated from it the part which relates to extra compensation. I think that the attorney ought to be paid the additional expenses to which he was put, but I think it would be a bad precedent for Congress to allow extra compensation to a district attorney when he may go outside of his district for the purpose of performing a service which the Government asks him to perform. I do not understand that a district attorney is compelled to remain in his district; I think he may be sent by the Government outside of his district, and I think that in such a case the Government ought to pay him for all of the expenses which he incurs——

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from Utah——

Mr. KING. Let me complete the sentence—but if we establish the precedent of paying an employee of the Government extra compensation when he may go outside of the territorial boundaries of the field to which he was appointed, we shall be swamped with claims from all parts of the United States.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, men who are employed in the Agricultural Department are sent to a given State to aid in field work. They may, when they are employed, anticipate, as the Government may have anticipated, that that would be their field, but they are called to some other State. Shall they, therefore, get extra compensation? I might give many instances which will suggest themselves readily to the minds of Senators.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will yield, I wish to correct a false impression which I probably created, for I find now that this claim only covers the extra expense which Mr. Reames incurred. His statement, as printed in the report, is:

> The amount of my claim of $2,000 does not represent the actual expense account to which I have been put in the matter of these special assignments over and above the expense account paid to me.

As it is now submitted, the sum is not enough to reimburse him for his actual additional expense.

Mr. KING. Then, I have no objection to the bill; but if it covered extra compensation I would object to it, because I think it would be a most dangerous and unfortunate precedent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $2,000 for extra and special services performed by Clarence L. Reames while United States district attorney at Portland, Oreg., in the prosecution of certain cases in the northern district of California and in the western district of Washington, pursuant to the request of the Attorney General, during the years 1916 and 1917.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the report of the Committee on Claims be printed in the RECORD. It fully explains the whole matter, and I hope the bill will be passed.

There being no objection, the report of the committee was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Mr. STANFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report to accompany S. 2356:
> The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2356) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.
>
> The facts in the case are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 765, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.
> [Senate Report No. 765, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session.]
> The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3487) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.
>
> This bill provides for the payment of $2,000 to Clarence L. Reames for extra and special services performed by him while United States district attorney at Portland, Oreg., in the prosecution of certain cases in the northern district of California and in the western district of Washington pursuant to the request of the Attorney General during the years 1916 and 1917.

An affidavit of the claimant and a letter from the Acting Attorney General are appended hereto and made a part of this report.

SEATTLE, WASH., October 1, 1919.

I herewith present my claim against the United States of America in the sum of $2,000 growing out of the following circumstances.

In April, 1916, while serving as United States attorney for Oregon, I was at Medford, Oreg., on official business, where I received telegraphic orders from the Attorney General to proceed to San Francisco, Calif., and there take charge of for the United States the case of the United States v. Norman D. Cook et al., then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. I proceeded to San Francisco immediately and spent approximately two weeks in the preparation of the case for trial. The indictment was directed against Norman D. Cook, Franklin Bull, and some 16 other defendants, charging a conspiracy to violate section 215 of the Penal Code, in procuring a large number of persons to file claims for the forfeited lands of the Oregon & California Railroad Co., and to collect from said applicants location fees therefor. The trial itself lasted approximately two months, during all of which time I was busy night and day in the preparation and presentation of the case. A number of the defendants pleaded guilty, and as to the others upon the first trial the jury disagreed, standing 11 for conviction and 1 for acquittal. I returned to my home in Portland for a short time, and was again by the Attorney General directed to proceed to San Francisco to retry the case. The second trial occupied the same length of time as the first, resulting in the conviction of another of the defendants, the acquittal of two others, and as to the rest the jury disagreed, standing 10 for the conviction of the principal defendants and 2 for their acquittal. I returned to Portland again, and was for the third time directed to proceed to San Francisco to present to the grand jury at San Francisco the case of the United States v. S. A. D. Puter et al., involving a similar state of facts as was involved in the so-called Cook fraud cases. The defendants in the Puter cases have recently all pleaded guilty.

Thus from approximately May 1, 1916, until approximately December 6, 1916, with the exception only of a short time between the trials, I was at San Francisco engaged in this work outside of my district.

During all the time I was in San Francisco I was required to and did, at my own expense, maintain my home in Portland, Oreg., and the only amount received by me was my salary of $375 per month as United States attorney for Oregon and the additional sum of $4 per day to defray the expenses of myself and wife at San Francisco.

The trials themselves were strenuous. There had been approximately 21,000 applications filed with the Oregon & California Railroad Co. to purchase the lands in question, and it was necessary for me to study each one of these, so that I could know the relation of that claim with other claims conflicting therewith.

In January, 1917, while at Portland serving as United States attorney, I received a peremptory order from the Attorney General to proceed at once to Seattle, Wash., and take charge of the Billingsley graft cases and the prosecution of the cases against the mayor, the chief of police, the police and detective departments of Seattle, and the sheriff's office of King County, Wash. This I did, necessarily remaining away from my home and in Seattle, Wash., for a period of approximately two months, in the trial of an important criminal case which attracted nation-wide attention.

During all the time I was in Seattle I had to maintain my home in Portland, Oreg., as my wife was sick and in a hospital in Portland. Upon receiving the assignment to proceed to Seattle, I protested to the Attorney General that I was financially unable to make the sacrifice; and the Attorney General assured me that at the conclusion of the services at Seattle the matter would be taken up to ascertain whether or not additional compensation could be paid.

During all the time that I was in Seattle I received but $4 a day as an expense account and my salary of $375 per month as United States attorney for Oregon.

During all the time that I was absent in San Francisco and Seattle I maintained at Portland, Oreg., and there conducted, without any extra expense to the United States, the office of the United States attorney at Portland, Oreg. During none of that time was the Government required to employ any additional assistance in the Portland office, and I virtually did the work in the several offices to which I was sent, in addition to my own work as United States attorney for Oregon.

The amount of my claim of $2,000 does not represent the actual expense account to which I have been put in the matter of these special assignments over and above the expense account paid to me.

Respectfully submitted.

CLARENCE L. REAMES.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, county of Kings, ss:

I, Clarence L. Reames, being first duly sworn, depose and say: That I am the claimant named in the within claim and to whom the same is due; that no part of said sum of $2,000 has ever been paid to me, and that I have never received, either directly or indirectly, any part or portion thereof; that the said claim, and the whole thereof, constitutes and is a just and bona fide claim in my favor against the United States of America.

CLARENCE L. REAMES.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this the 1st day of October, 1919.

[SEAL.] IVAN L. HYLAND,
Notary Public in and for the State of Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., September 6, 1919.

CLARENCE L. REAMES, Esq.,
Attorney at Law, Seattle, Wash.

SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo with respect to your claim for additional compensation in the cases of United States v. Norman B. Cook et al., and United States v. Peter et al., in the northern district of California, and United States v. McGill et al., in the western district of Washington.

In reply you are advised that the correspondence with respect to this matter has been carefully reviewed, and the department has reached the conclusion that you are entitled to additional compensation, particularly in view of the fact that you were undoubtedly put to much additional expense because of these special assignments.

Therefore, if requested by Congress for advice and recommendation, I shall state that, in my opinion, you should be allowed $2,000, the approximate amount claimed by you, as additional compensation for all services rendered in special cases and matters which did not pertain to your regular employment during the period you were United States attorney for the district of Oregon.

Respectfully,

C. B. AMES,
Acting Attorney General.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2391) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. That bill will take some little discussion, and there is no use taking it up now. Though I think it is a good bill, perhaps, it should go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2228) to amend certain sections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2337) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That bill could not be considered under the rule now prevailing and I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS, ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida, for military purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, before the bill goes over, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to allow me to make a statement in regard to the bill and also to submit an amendment to it.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator.

When this bill was previously under consideration some two weeks ago the question arose, on the part of some Senators, at least, who made objection to the bill, as to the property involved reverting to the Government in the event it was not used for military purposes. My colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], took the question up with the War Department, and the War Department had no objection to the enactment of the bill and the transfer of the property to the State to be used for military purposes, but proposed an amendment which provides that the property shall revert to the Government of the United States in the event that the President of the United States shall in writing call upon the governor of the State of Florida to return the property for the uses of the Federal Government. I am going to propose an amendment which is copied verbatim from the amendment suggested by the Secretary of War in the letter which he wrote my colleague upon this subject. I hope that the amendment will be satisfactory, and that the bill, with this amendment added, may be considered and passed without objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the end of line 7, it is proposed to strike out the period and to add—subject to the following express conditions: That upon notice in writing by the President of the United States to the governor of the State of Florida that the United States has need for said property, this grant shall cease and determine, and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall immediately revert to the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course, I would not attempt to interfere with an amendment offered by a Senator from Florida to a bill which especially interests the Senators from Florida, but if I had my way about the matter I would give this property to the State of Florida without any strings to it at all.

I do not see any necessity for tying a string of this kind to property of that particular nature. The property never is going to be of military value to the United States Government. It is so situated, as I recollect, in the city of St. Augustine that it never can be used for anything but a storehouse or a meeting room. It is not large enough to contain any large body of troops. The plat of land is not big enough to warrant its ever being used for military purposes on any extensive scale. St. Augustine itself is not enough of a strategic point, either on railroads or on navigable waters, to warrant any great military development there.

This property, as I recollect, is a relic of bygone days. We have several of them around the United States; and, according to my way of thinking, the quicker the Government gets rid of them, even if it gives them to the States, the better.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator for his comment; and what he says is very true. This is a small quantity of land right in St. Augustine. It could not be used for any military purpose of any consequence, but it has for years been used as a headquarters of the National Guard. That is what the military authorities want it for at the present time. The State has appropriated $40,000 to be expended upon this little plat of land for the purpose of having its storehouses and its National Guard headquarters there, and for carrying out such plans as may be necessary in connection with directing the National Guard.

Of course, I dislike very much to have this amendment placed upon the bill. It is not at all in accord with my ideas, but the State authorities are very anxious to get the grant made so that they can proceed with the building. While the State will be in considerable jeopardy in expending $40,000 for a building upon this land, the authorities connected with the National Guard of Florida have indicated that rather than not have the grant made at all they would be agreeable to accepting the grant with this amendment.

It is only under those circumstances that I have proposed this amendment, in order to have the grant made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will agree with me that the amendment is a violation of that comity which should exist between the Federal Government and the government of a sovereign State.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I fully agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida a question, and also to have the matter referred to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The Senator from New York stated that this tract would never be used, that it was not suitable for use, by the Government for military purposes, and that there are a great many other tracts throughout the country in the same category. What I want to ask is, Why not have the Government sell this property outright? If the State of Florida wants to buy it, well and good; but why not sell all these various tracts and let the National Government get rid of them, but get what they are worth?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course that is a question of policy. This is a very small amount of land, but it has been used for a great many years by the State under a one-dollar-a-year lease from the Federal Government. In view of the cooperation of the State and the Federal Government in carrying on the operations of the National Guard, and the fact that it is a cooperative and a mutual affair, we feel that the Federal Government certainly should not object to allowing the State to take over this land so as to spend, if it obtains it, $40,000 for a building for the purpose of carrying on a business which is primarily that of the Federal Government, namely, directing the administration of the National Guard law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator. Take the situation, for instance, in my State. In Seattle and in Spokane and in Yakima, and I think in several other places, the State has armories for its National Guard. The National Government has not donated any land to any of these cities or to the State for these purposes. The State or the cities or the localities have had to acquire the sites, and then they have had to appropriate the money to put up the buildings.

I do not want to prevent the passage of the Senator's bill, but it does seem to me that the wise thing to do would be for the National Government to sell this land. If it is close to the heart of the city of St. Augustine, even though it is a small tract, it is worth something, and probably it is pretty valuable. The National Government ought to get what it can out of it. If the State of Florida wants it for military purposes, let it pay what it thinks it is worth and then use it for those purposes. Let it do as the other States of the Union have to do with reference to these matters.

Mr. TRAMMELL. We have done as other States have done in regard to the National Guard armories. We have them scattered all over Florida. The State has many hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in armories, and in some instances that is true even of the counties. I remember that the county of Monroe expended $10,000 of county funds for an armory; so Florida has certainly met the same requirements that have been imposed on other States with regard to armories and furnishing facilities of that character.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me how many acres of land are involved?

Mr. FLETCHER. About 2¼ or 2½ acres.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And how much is it worth? How much is the land adjoining it worth?

Mr. FLETCHER. May I answer the question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a plat of the land here. I will say to the Senator further, regarding his inquiry, that Florida, as my colleague has said, has these armories all over the State. The old St. Francis Barracks were a sort of a fort, established there a great many years ago. They have been handed down from Spanish times, really. They are down on the bay, and at a portion of the town where there is not very much settlement. A cemetery adjoins the barracks on one side and the bay on the other. I think altogether there are about 2½ acres in the whole tract. It is bounded on the north by St. Francis Street, on the west by Charlotte Street—there is a small street running between the two pieces—and on the east it is bounded by the Matanzas River.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator merely give me his opinion, if he knows, or what somebody else says, as to the value of the adjoining lands? What could you ordinarily buy lands adjoining this tract for?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I have indicated, the land is surrounded by streets. I do not know what the lands across the streets might be worth, in some instances——

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I should like to know.

Mr. FLETCHER. But my information is that the entire property is worth perhaps $15,000 or $20,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why should not the National Government sell that land and get rid of it entirely? If the State wants to buy it, I should be perfectly willing to sell it to the State, probably at a little bit lower price than to others; but let us sell it and get rid of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. For some time the War Department has recommended abandoning this old place.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I know that.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I think perhaps for 14 years the State has been in possession of it under this one-year lease, subject to termination at any time that the War Department might give notice. The legislature which met in 1921, last year, appropriated $40,000 for the purpose of putting up a building on this tract so as better to accommodate the needs of the National Guard. It is used as a sort of arsenal and headquarters. The adjutant general of the State, for instance, occupies one of these buildings, and it is a kind of arsenal for the storage of National Guard supplies. They wanted this additional building, and the last legislature made the necessary appropriation.

Of course, the people would not care to spend $40,000 there in putting up a new building when they have nothing more than a lease which may be terminated at any day upon notice, and therefore my colleague introduced a bill to grant these premises to the State for military purposes. That is specified in the bill as he introduced it. Of course, the National Guard is a part of the Military Establishment of the Federal Government as well as of the States. The National Guard is one of our lines of defense, and the War Department is perfectly willing to deed the land to the State. I have a letter from the Secretary of War upon that subject, and the report shows that the War Department has not the slightest objection to granting the land outright to the State for use for military purposes. The bill that my colleague introduced was referred to the War Department and sent back with a favorable report from the Secretary of War; so that that matter has all been passed upon.

The War Department is perfectly willing to have this bill passed as it was introduced and as it is reported; but when the question came up a few days ago the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] raised some objection to it. His objection was based upon the idea that if the land ceased to be used for military purposes it ought to revert to the Federal Government, and he wanted a provision to that effect put into the measure. Upon objection, the bill went over, and I think the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] also raised the same question, and other Senators suggested that there ought to be some provision whereby the grant should cease if the premises ceased to be used for military purposes.

I then communicated with the Secretary of War and stated these objections that were made to the bill, and suggested that he submit the form of an amendment which he would recommend to take care of and meet those objections. Hence it is that this matter has now come up, and my colleague proposes the amendment which the Secretary of War suggests in pursuance of my request that he frame an amendment so as to meet the objections which had been urged to the bill.

As my colleague has said, our people want the matter settled. We want to know whether we are going to spend this $40,000 on the premises or not, and whether the Government is to turn over the tract so that the National Guard may have the use of this property as they have had in the past on this dollar-a-year lease, but which is subject to be terminated at any time.

I am perfectly confident that the President is not going to call on the State authorities for these old St. Francis Barracks, as they are known, because he never will have any use for them. I am perfectly confident that with this amendment the State will get what they can safely count on, really what will amount in effect to a grant of the premises, because I am sure the Federal Government is never going to want the premises; but in order to meet the objections which have been made I asked the Secretary of War to frame an amendment, and he has done so. This is his letter:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated December 7, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 2138, * * * in which letter you state there is senatorial objection because the bill contains no reversion of title clause and suggest that the War Department submit the form of an amendment to provide for reversion of title when the property ceases to be used by the State for military purposes.

I asked that because I wanted to be able to offer here, when the bill came up again, the recommendation of the War Department to cover that objection.

You are advised that if it is the desire of Congress to provide for reversion of title—

The War Department does not voluntarily insist upon this at all, or urge it, but the Secretary of War says:

You are advised that if it is the desire of Congress to provide for reversion of title to the United States in the event of cessation of use of the property for military purposes, the following amendment is suggested:

In line 7 strike out the period and add:

"Only, subject to the express condition that whenever the buildings and lands hereby donated cease to be used by the State of Florida for military purposes, this grant shall cease and determine and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall revert to the United States."

I prefer that amendment, really, to the one offered by my colleague; but he has seen fit to go the whole limit in the matter and offers the amendment which the department itself says would be its preference. The letter continues:

The following alternative amendment, believed by the War Department to be preferable to the foregoing, is also submitted for consideration.

That is the amendment which my colleague has offered, namely, on line 7 to strike out the period and add the following:

subject to the following express condition that upon notice in writing by the President of the United States to the governor of the State of Florida that the United States has need for said property, this grant shall cease and determine and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall immediately revert to the United States.

That is the amendment my colleague has offered, and it is offered because he and I agree that we would like to have the matter disposed of one way or the other. This amendment is offered to meet any possible objection which could be raised to the bill. It is plain, and means exactly what it says, that this grant is made now, with this proviso, "subject to the following express condition"; that is, when the President wants it for the Government he simply is to give notice to the governor of Florida that the Government wants it, and the Government will take it over. That is all there is to it. It seems to me that is all that could be asked in the matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with the explanation which has been made, and in view of the fact that the land is being used now by the State for the National Guard, I shall withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill. But I want to state, before resuming my seat, that I am not in accord with the view expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Whenever the Government of the United States wants a little piece of land for military or for other purposes it has to go into the market, and usually it is mulcted a very large amount for the tract of land which it desires. The Government does not get anything for nothing, and I feel that when the Government does not need lands which it has acquired by condemnation, or in any other manner, it ought to dispose of the land—and in that respect I agree with the Senator from New York—as quickly as possible; but I do not think that the Government ought to give it away. I agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the Government ought to sell all these parcels of land which it does not require, sell them to the highest bidder, and get the very best price possible; and if this were not used now by the State for military purposes I should object to this measure.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will state also, Mr. President, that it is not only used, but a considerable part of the improvements on it at the present time have been put there by State expenditures. The State has already expended more or less money on the improvement of this land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the report on this bill is very brief, and I ask that the report, together with the letter from the Secretary of War to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report [to accompany S. 2138]:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

This measure has the approval of the War Department. In a letter addressed to the chairman by the Secretary of War on July 27, 1921, the following statement is made:

"I desire to acknowledge receipt of bill S. 2138, which you referred to me July 20, 1921, for the views of the War Department. In reply I desire to inform you that the War Department has no objection to the transfer of St. Francis Barracks to the State of Florida under the provisions of the bill presented. St. Francis Barracks is one of the reservations included in a list of real estate submitted to the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives as being no longer needed by the War Department and for such disposition as Congress may deem proper."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 17, 1921.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated December 7, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 2138, "A bill providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes," in which letter you state there is senatorial objection because the bill contains no reversion of title clause and suggest that the War Department submit the form of an amendment to provide for reversion of title when the property ceases to be used by the State for military purposes.

You are advised that if it is the desire of Congress to provide for reversion of title to the United States in the event of cessation of use of the property for military purposes, the following amendment is suggested:

In line 7, strike out the period and add—

"only, subject to the express condition that whenever the buildings and lands hereby donated cease to be used by the State of Florida for military purposes, this grant shall cease and determine and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall revert to the United States."

The following alternative amendment believed by the War Department to be preferable to the foregoing is also submitted for consideration:

In line 7, strike out the period and add—

"subject to the following express condition that upon notice in writing by the President of the United States to the governor of the State of Florida that the United States has need for said property, this grant shall cease and determine and title to said lands and all improvements thereon shall immediately revert to the United States."

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

HIGH PRICES OF HOUSE-FURNISHING GOODS.

The resolution (S. Res. 127) to investigate the causes of factory, wholesale, and retail price conditions in the principal branches of house-furnishing goods industry and trade, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I hope this resolution may be disposed of. It has been pending a long time, and it seems to me to relate to a very important subject. It provides for an investigation which will be of general interest to the country. The resoluion provides for an investigation of "the causes of factory, wholesale, and retail price conditions in the principal branches of house-furnishing goods industry and trade, beginning with January, 1920, and particularly to ascertain the organization and interrelations of corporations and firms engaged therein," and so forth.

There are some circumstances, it seems to me, which justify prompt action on this resolution. It is well known that in the industry referred to prices have been maintained at very exorbitant standards, established during the latter part of the war period. I would like to have some reason given for not disposing of this resolution at the present time. I do not think it would require a very great length of time or would provoke much discussion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there was nothing in the title of the resolution to indicate that the Federal Trade Commission was to make this investigation. I supposed it was to be an investigation by some committee of Congress, and personally I have never seen very much come out of such investigations. But I see the Federal Trade Commission is directed by the resolution to make the investigation, and, as far as I am concerned, I withdraw my objection to its present consideration. From what I hear, the Attorney General is inaugurating an investigation now that will very likely cover this situation fully, and I do not see the necessity for duplicating the expense. We shall probably get better and quicker results from the work of the Attorney General just now than in this way. But I shall withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the resolution, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as I read it, it is mandatory upon the Federal Trade Commission to make this investigation. As I understand the project of the Department of Justice, this would certainly duplicate, in part at least, the work which the Department of Justice has already started.

Mr. ROBINSON. During the last few days the press has contained announcements that the Department of Justice expects to institute an investigation into certain lines of industry for the reason that it is believed those industries are controlled by combinations or trusts. This resolution relates to one particular branch of industry, and it is particularly within the province of the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the question as to whether unfair practices or methods of competition, or restraints of trade, combinations, or monopolies are occurring in industry.

This investigation will not in anywise interfere with any action the Department of Justice finds it necessary or desirable to take for the prosecution or punishment of persons who have violated the antitrust law or any other law of the United States relating to their business. It is desirable and, in my judgment, it is necessary that the particular questions comprehended in this resolution be considered and determined, and I still think that the resolution ought to be considered and passed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would not want to interfere in any way with the work the Attorney General is doing; I would not intentionally do anything that would have that effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am in accord with the statement just made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in favor of this resolution, however, because it seems to me the work of the Federal Trade Commission and whatever the Attorney General intends to do in the way of investigating the subject would be perfectly harmonious. I think they could help each other. The Federal Trade Commission is equipped for this kind of work. They have experts, if there is such a thing, for doing this kind of work. They can do it more quickly and as effectively, I believe, as any other branch of the Government. More than that, it is a part of their duty, if they find the laws violated, to turn the evidence which they discover over to the Attorney General.

Therefore it seems the fact that the Attorney General was making an investigation a part of which was covered by the investigation to be made by the Federal Trade Commission would only help; it would not increase the expense. They would coordinate their work and work in perfect harmony. Certainly the fact that this particular line mentioned in the resolution is to be investigated will have a good effect upon the prices the people have to pay, and will have a tendency to lower the cost of living in that particular line.

While ordinarily there may be a great deal in what the Senator from Washington has said, that investigations made by committees do not amount to very much, I think they often do amount to a great deal; but whether they do or not does not apply to this question. I would be glad to know that the Attorney General was looking into it with a view of prosecuting offenders, if there are such, and I would be glad to have the Federal Trade Commission assist in making that investigation. I think there will be no duplication of work whatever, but perfect coordination.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is probably more familiar with the terms of the Federal Trade Commission act than I am, and I would like to know if the Senate has power to direct the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. It has done that in a great many cases, and it always results in the investigation being made. I think it has that power.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wondered if we could do it by a simple Senate resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we can, but I say that without having looked up the law. Very often, however, we have taken this course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am inclined to think that there is a provision of the law under which this resolution would be proper.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Upon that point, I think it is true that the Senate can not by simple resolution fix the duties of the Federal Trade Commission. Those are defined by law. Under the existing law, however, the Federal Trade Commission has the power to make such investigations as are comprehended in the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was led to ask the question by the wording of the resolution, that the Federal Trade Commission is "directed" to make the investigation.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would at least advise the Federal Trade Commission that the Senate of the United States regards this investigation as necessary, and will undoubtedly result in an investigation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I did not have that in mind; it was only a question as to whether it was really proper, whether we have the authority to direct or request them to do it. I am inclined to think, however, that there is a provision in the law creating the Federal Trade Commission requiring it to act upon a resolution of either branch of Congress. If that is true, we can direct them to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is a provision in the law to that effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this resolution, although I am not convinced that its passage will prove of any benefit to the country. What is needed is a thorough investigation by the Department of Justice of the activities of trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and conspiracies to maintain prices and destroy competition.

I have never been convinced that the Federal Trade Commission has justified its creation. I know that my party has pointed to this organization as one of the achievements of the Democratic Party. Perhaps it has accomplished some good. Perhaps it may prove efficacious in meeting some of the economic and trade problems with which we are confronted. I sincerely hope that so long as the Federal Trade Commission exists it will function in the interest of the people. I have no prejudice whatever against the organization, but from an examination of its activities—not an examination, however, as complete as I have desired to make—I have not been persuaded that it would accomplish the results which were prophesied when it was brought into existence. Nor have I been satisfied that it would mitigate the evils to which its attention has been drawn.

Mr. President, that there are combinations denounced by the Sherman antitrust law no one can deny. During the war there was a remarkable tendency toward consolidation and combination. A price-fixing policy was adopted by the Government, and substantially all industries either combined to fix prices or adopted a course which prevented the law of supply and demand from operating and effectually destroyed competition. Prices of commodities reached unheard of heights, and the people were compelled to pay extortionate prices. Great fortunes were made by hundreds and thousands of corporations as well as individuals in the manufacture and sale of commodities required by the Government as well as by the people. The prices of raw materials as well as finished products went to unreasonable heights, and as these prices advanced labor was compelled to demand higher wages, and as wages advanced the prices of commodities were raised, and so the vicious circle was continued. The Sherman antitrust law, as well as State statutes, aimed against combinations and trusts were practically ignored, and profiteering was rampant in all parts of the land.

This situation has not been materially changed since the war was over. The benefits of combinations to the producers and to the manufacturers and to the sellers were so apparent that they have attempted to continue the practices and to perpetuate the combinations formed, so that now in all parts of the land we have conditions which impose upon the people unjust burdens. Prices are too high in most of the commodities which the people are compelled to buy. Competition is still a stranger in our midst. Price fixing is still continued not only upon the part of many wholesalers and middlemen but also upon the part of retailers. The trusts which reached such powerful proportions during the war still exist—or, at least, some of them—and they are pursuing policies which burden the people and tend to prevent a return to legitimate and proper conditions. So long as there are conspiracies and combinations and trusts for the purpose of maintaining high prices and of destroying competition, there will be industrial unrest. The great body of working people will demand, if these conditions continue, the enactment of laws that will either nationalize some industries or subject business to restraints that will hamper and deaden and perhaps destroy the same. If the American business men were wise, they would contend for the operation of the law of supply and demand. They would oppose trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. They would be satisfied with reasonable profits and would join in every movement that makes for a reduction in the prices, particularly of those commodities entering into the lives of the great mass of the people. When the people see that the returns upon capital are reasonable, they will be satisfied with reduced wages; but so long as prices are inordinately high for food and fuel and clothing and the necessities of life the wage earners will demand, and rightfully demand, a high standard of wage. There must be some relation between wages and the products which the wage earners are compelled to buy. Employers can not insist upon a lowering of wages and at the same time pursue a course which tends to maintain a high level of prices for the products and commodities which the laboring people are compelled to purchase.

During the closing months of the last administration Attorney General Palmer inaugurated an active campaign against monopolies and combinations which were interfering with the laws of supply and demand. He gave instructions to the various district attorneys to enforce the Sherman antitrust law. Indictments were found and prosecutions instituted. I am glad to say that the present Attorney General is zealously seeking to enforce the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. I am sure that he will receive the hearty support of the Democrats in the Senate, and they will gladly join in appropriating such sums as may be deemed necessary in the enforcement of the Federal statutes against trusts and monopolies and conspiracies in restraint of trade.

The State of New York has recently been doing excellent work in enforcing State laws against conspiracies which are seeking to rob the people. A committee of the State legislature, with which Mr. Untermeyer is associated, has conducted very important investigations, and as a result of the same have brought many violators of the law before the bar of justice. Unfortunately, many of the States seem to be quiescent in regard to this important matter. Most of the States have strong if not drastic laws for the punishment of intrastate combinations and conspiracies to hamper and interfere with trade and commerce. Unfortunately, many of the State officials seem to ignore their own statutes, or, at least, they fail to enforce them against the enormous infractions which must come to the notice of all inquiring persons within such States. If the State officials would vigorously enforce their statutes I am sure there would be marked improvement in our economic situation. If these combinations and conspiracies which maintain high prices for commodities and impose unjust burdens upon the people were destroyed, the economic and industrial and commercial tide would move forward with greater celerity for the welfare and benefit of the people. Of course, the States can not deal with interstate commerce, and undoubtedly most of the evils resulting from combinations, trusts, and monopolies are found in interstate commerce. The building exposé in New York shows what a vigorous enforcement of State laws can do. Contractors and builders and those who furnish building materials and supplies as well as certain labor leaders violated State laws. Some have been prosecuted. Some have been sent to the penitentiary and more should find their way behind the bars of the State penitentiary.

The investigations in Chicago showed that State laws were violated and that the conspiracies and combinations were so effective that the people had been robbed of hundreds of millions of dollars. The shortage of houses has resulted largely from the combinations and conspiracies among the building trades and those who supply materials and corrupt labor leaders. If these combinations could be destroyed, there would be a remarkable increase in building activity and the housing situation would very quickly be relieved.

Investigations show that in this city building materials and the cost of building are more than 100 per cent in advance of what they were in 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914. There is no justification for the high cost of building materials in Washington. The grand jury of the District could with propriety investigate the causes of the extortionate prices for building material, building construction, and so forth. A strong public sentiment should be developed in favor of the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law, and it should be enforced. If properly enforced and rightly interpreted, it will correct many of the evils which now afflict the public. If it is defective, it should be strengthened. But this, however, must be patent to every person who is familiar with our industrial and economic condition: The laws of supply and demand and the laws or principles of competition must be preserved. Combinations, monopolies, and trusts must not be permitted to rear their ugly heads and to control the economic life of the people. The progress of our country has resulted from the operation of natural laws and natural forces. Those who are opposed to governmental ownership of public utilities and the great basic industries and enterprises of our country must support the policy which insures competition and the operation of the law of supply and demand. If trusts and monopolies and combinations get control of industry and rob and plunder the people, a sentiment will be developed, which will be irresistible, either in favor of Government ownership or of Government control.

Government ownership is deadening and deadly and destructive. Governmental supervision of business means a moribund decadent condition in our industrial and business life. Penal statutes vigorously enforced will produce a condition that will permit business to develop and genius and enterprise to win well-deserved victories, and at the same time restrain the growth of corporations and trusts and combinations which will nullify the natural laws of trade and produce a condition of industrial servitude.

Corporations and manufacturing concerns have recently been engaged in price fixing and in adopting policies which were inimical to the welfare of the people. The Supreme Court in a recent decision, in which the activities of certain lumber interests were involved, has denounced these price-fixing agreements and arrangements. This is a very wholesome decision and should be an admonition to those who are constrained to persist in unlawful practices to conform to the laws of the land as well as to the principles of morality and justice.

Mr. President, this resolution, as I have stated at the outset, will not in my opinion accomplish any particular good. If it is a proper resolution its scope should be broadened. We are told that the Standard Oil Co. and other huge combinations have obtained control of the oil industry of the United States and are robbing the people of hundreds of millions annually. The oil companies should be investigated and other industries should receive the attention of the Federal Trade Commission if it is to accomplish any good and bring about relief from some of the intolerable burdens which combinations and trusts and monopolies are now inflicting upon the people. If, however, Senators think that this resolution will be of some benefit I shall not interpose objection to its passage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator has, perhaps somewhat unconsciously, made a wholesale attack on prosecuting officers, both State and national. It is undoubtedly true that there has been a failure to protect the public against violations of the antitrust law, but in my opinion that failure has been due in large part to lack of information available to the officer whose duty it is to institute prosecutions.

In the case of the ordinary prosecuting attorney, he usually has one assistant, though in the large centers of course he has more. He has no fund available for making investigations of the character toward which the pending resolution is directed. He would be pitiably impotent to ascertain the true facts affecting this or any other industry which is governed or largely influenced by combinations in restraint of trade.

The Government, in order to facilitate the enforcement of its antitrust law and to protect the public against unfair competition in trade, created the Federal Trade Commission. Its responsibilities are very great. Its tasks are very difficult. When it entered upon the investigation of some of the great trusts of the country it drew against itself and its activities all the concentrated fire that their agencies and their resources could command and control. It made mistakes. It probably made failures. But in my judgment it has justified itself and has rendered service of great value to the country and to the people of the Nation. It never will be popular if it does its duty. It never will be efficient if it is hampered by lack of the necessary instrumentalities and funds.

It is true that the provisions of the resolution, as stated by the Senator from Utah, are limited and that the investigation called for by the particular resolution is restricted, but therein lies its chief value. While I have no objection whatever, but on the contrary would facilitate and promote in every way within my power the investigation of any combination which has for its purpose the creation or the perpetuation of unfair competition in trade within the meaning of the laws of the United States, I realize that if the resolution be so broadened as to involve an investigation of the Oil Trust and of the various other trusts which we regard as detrimental to the public interest, it would defeat the accomplishment of any substantial purpose under the resolution. I am heartily in favor of its passage even though the investigation will not be so comprehensive as the Senator from Utah would desire and as other Senators would desire.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator adverted to that part of my remarks in which, apparently, I criticized the State officials for their inactivity or failure to enforce the State laws. Does not the Senator think that there has been too much of a disposition upon the part of State officials, where there are Federal statutes which seem to comprehend subject matters, to devolve upon the Federal Government responsibilities which rest upon them?

Take, for instance, the enforcement of the law against the manufacture and use of liquor, commonly known as the prohibition law. Many of the States have more strict laws than the Volstead Act, and yet the States are shirking their responsibility in some instances and devolving the duty upon the Federal Government to enforce the law. There are trusts and combinations within States, and the Senator, I think, will bear me out that it is very seldom that a State statute is invoked against a trust or combination intrastate in character.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think it is undoubtedly true that during the last quarter of a century there has been a constantly growing tendency upon the part of the people of the country, and it may have been concurred in by State officers, to let responsibility rest upon the Federal Government. It is not limited to the antitrust laws, but in almost every sphere of activity they are now saying, "Let George or Uncle Sam do it." There are obvious reasons for that, but I shall not take the time of the Senate now to go into them in detail.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I pointed out to my friend the Senator from Utah that the Federal Government very naturally may be relied upon more effectively to enforce antitrust laws than can the instrumentalities of the State. The difficulties inhere in the ramifications of the trusts in the fact that for the most part they are involved or engaged in interstate commerce and in the further fact that the spheres of their activities are beyond the jurisdiction of the authorities of any one State, if indeed they are within the control of authorities or of any power which human government has established.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has rather covered the matter to which I desire to direct attention. While it may be true that there is a disposition generally to introduce the Federal Government into lines which ought to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the States, when it comes to those matters, I take it that the Senator from Utah must recognize that the State is for all practical purposes impotent because these are practically all interstate transactions and interstate combinations. Ordinarily the offending corporation has its domicile beyond the State in which it operates, or many of the States in which it operates; the witnesses whose testimony would demonstrate the existence of the combination or the charging of exorbitant prices are beyond the jurisdiction of the State and could not be reached at all.

But, Mr. President, I notice, if the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me, that the inquiry here contemplated is directed only at the price conditions with respect to the principal branches of the house-furnishing goods industry and trade. It seems to me that is a very limited scope. I should take it that that would include nothing more than furniture, possibly pictures and carpets.

Mr. KING. Would it include hardware?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say not. I doubt whether it would even include such things as stoves or kitchen utensils. But even though those should be embraced, my understanding about it is that the thing that bears most heavily upon the householder nowadays is the price of food, the retail prices of food and prices of clothing, particularly shoes. The burden of providing shoes for a family of three or four or five children is becoming something oppressive. I do not see why the investigation should be so restricted as is proposed in the pending resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had discussed——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I am not opposed to the pending resolution, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the exceedingly limited scope of the activities of the Federal Trade Commission. So far as remedial purposes are concerned, practically the Federal Trade Commission has jurisdiction only over what may be called unfair methods of trade or unfair competition. For violations of the antitrust law they are incapable of affording any remedy, and when we come to the matter of investigation I have found that commission to be an exceedingly slow, ponderous, and dilatory body. If I remember correctly, several years ago we directed the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the Lumber Trust, and it was two years before we obtained any report from them on that subject.

The Department of Justice moves more expeditiously. When the attention of the Department of Justice is called to a particular case in which it thinks there is involved a violation of the antitrust law, it at once sends out its examiners, its special men, to investigate the subject matter and obtain the evidence in the case, so that it may be presented to the court. In that manner relief is afforded expeditiously.

On yesterday the Supreme Court announced a decision which is one of the very few that have been rendered under the law creating the Federal Trade Commission. I have not seen the decision printed in full, but I have seen an abstract of it in the newspapers. From what I there read I gather that the court holds that the Federal Trade Commission are limited so far as remedial purposes are concerned to cases involving unfair methods of competition; that in other respects they are simply what may be called an investigating body, a body with power merely to investigate and report.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the Department of Justice has not been idle. Within the last few years a great combination was formed, with headquarters at Memphis, Tenn., I think, or in that section of the country, of the hard wood lumber manufacturers. Very shrewdly they formed a combination with a view of evading the antitrust law. I never saw a more cunning scheme evolved than that. Lately, within two weeks past, I think, that case was passed upon by the Supreme Court, and by a majority of 5 to 4 the court held that the Hard Wood Lumber Trust in the Southwest was in violation of the law, and they broke it up. So from what I have seen under this administration I have great faith that the Department of Justice will prosecute the trusts and do so more rapidly than can be done under action by the Federal Trade Commission. If we are desirous of securing relief through the Federal Trade Commission, if we are to await information from them, according to the experience in the old Pine Wood Lumber Trust, I think we shall be much older than we now are before we get any affirmative results. Still I am willing that this homeopathic dose of paregoric shall be applied, but I have not much, if any, faith in it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, first, with respect to the statement of my friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I desire to say that before he came into the Chamber the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] had discussed the very point which he raised in criticism of the resolution, namely, that its scope is limited to a very narrow sphere and that the investigation which would result, if the resolution be agreed to, would be correspondingly limited. I had stated that I had no objection whatever to broadening the scope of the resolution, provided that it be so limited that the duties of the Federal Trade Commission under the resolution would not be made so burdensome as to delay unduly a conclusion by the commission. I have said that if the resolution be broadened, as was impliedly suggested by the Senator from Utah, so as to comprehend all trusts and industries which may be regarded as engaged in unfair competition, by reason of the very great work that would be entailed, little substantial benefit might be expected, and that that benefit would be too long delayed. I repeat that statement. I have, however, no objection whatever to broadening the scope of the resolution so as to comprehend other industries which the Senate may believe ought to be investigated.

With respect to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the Department of Justice acts more expeditiously and effectively than the Federal Trade Commission can act, I point out the fact that there is nothing in this resolution which raises the slightest conflict of jurisdiction or responsibility or of action between the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission. The Department of Justice has a very limited number of agents and their training and experience does not relate in detail to the investigation of subjects pertaining to unfair competition. The Federal Trade Commission is created for the purpose of making investigations of this character, and it is intended in the act defining the powers and the duties of the Federal Trade Commission that the fruits of its labors shall be available for the use of the Department of Justice in instituting or carrying on prosecutions.

The difficulty with the matter is that, wherever responsibility for action may be, little has been done; substantially nothing has been accomplished. Three years have come and gone since the armistice was signed, and yet the people of the United States have been plundered and are still being plundered by combinations in restraint of trade. Then, why should the Senate say, why should anyone in hearty and earnest sympathy with action declare, that this work shall be confined to any one officer or any one department of the Government when the Government has seen fit to create two departments and empowered them to deal with the subject?

I have already referred to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, in the discharge of its very grave duties and responsibilities, has necessarily invited and drawn the opposition and the attacks of the great combinations that are throttling and controlling the industries of the country to the detriment of the people of the United States.

I can understand why those combinations, their agents, and their representatives should resent an effort to put the well-organized and highly trained machinery of the Federal Trade Commission upon the trail which they have shamelessly taken in secrecy and in disregard of the laws of the country, but I can not understand how anybody who wants to protect the people of the United States against the extortions which have resulted to them from combinations in restraint of trade should stay any hand or silence any voice or oppose any effort that is clearly designed and calculated to accomplish the wholesome and beneficial public purpose of exposing and bringing to the knowledge of the public the means and the instrumentalities and the methods by which they have been and are being exploited. I should like to have some Senator who takes the contrary view of the matter explain such a viewpoint.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say first to the Senator from Washington that paragraph (d), section 6, of the Federal Trade Commission act gives authority for this kind of a resolution. Section 6 outlines many of the powers of the Federal Trade Commission, and among other things it provides in subdivision d:

> Upon the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violation of the antitrust laws by any corporation.

So there is no question that the resolution is proper under the law.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to discuss this matter further. It may be that I am unwise in trying to add anything more to what has been said; but it seems to me that I can not let the occasion pass without saying a word or two in my weak way in defense of the Federal Trade Commission. I am one of those Senators who believe that it has justified its existence. I know there are Senators who do not agree with me, and I have a great deal of respect for their judgment and for their opinions; but, in my humble judgment, the Federal Trade Commission is one of the most fearless and courageous investigating bodies to be found under the Government. I think it has made investigations that have required much ability and a high order of courage. From the very nature of their work they will of course be subject to great criticism. I realize that the members composing the commission are human and therefore liable to err. I am not even suggesting that they are above criticism, and I am not asking that they should be held to be above criticism. They ought to be judged as we judge other men, according to their work; but judging them by what they have done, Mr. President, I think they will stand out as a shining light amongst the agencies of civilization.

They are beset with all kinds of difficulties. They are necessarily, in their work, hunting for things that are wrong under complaints that are made; and, like any investigating body, they are always surrounded by charges, at least, of fraud and illegal acts. When they begin an investigation, or, having investigated, take a position as to the facts in any particular case applying to the great corporations and trusts of the country, of course they will be criticized, of course they will be condemned, and from sources that are the most powerful that can possibly exist in this or any other Government.

As the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said, we are confronted now with a condition that is startling and remarkable. While we might overlook some things of an illegal and profiteering character that occurred during the war, notwithstanding more than three years have passed since the armistice was signed, we still are suffering from such illegal practices and from such unconscionable profiteering on the part of a great many institutions, corporations, and individuals; and, as the Senator from Utah has said, there seem to have been no prosecutions that were successful in punishing these great combinations that are violating the law, as everybody must know, every day of the year.

Mr. President, I regret to say that I believe all that is true. I am sorry that more profiteering rascals have not been brought to justice and confined in the penitentiaries; but it seems to me that that is no reason why we should give up making investigations. That is no reason why we should not put the investigating body of this country to work getting the facts and exposing them to the public. If courts will not convict and prosecuting officers will not act, the public sentiment of the country will bring about relief if you will give publicity to the illegal acts of profiteers; and at least this investigation will bring publicity if made by the Federal Trade Commission.

I am not detracting in any respect from the work that is being done by the Attorney General. I would not weaken his hand in any way; and I would not support this resolution if I did not believe that it can go along in assistance and coordination with the action of the Attorney General, rather than having any bad effect upon his efforts. It will expedite them; and even if no prosecution ever results, an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission that places the facts before the people is bound to have a good effect. If we are to go on and if there are to be no prosecutions, if nobody is to be punished for profiteering and robbing the people of our country, then we are brought back to the fact that we have only one remedy, and that is public sentiment; that is publicity. That, at least, is what this investigation will bring forth, if nothing else comes from it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think this is a very good resolution, and I think the Federal Trade Commission has done a great deal of very good work. I am sure, as has been said by other Senators, that there are some concerns in the country that have been investigated by the Federal Trade Commission that would like to see it put out of commission.

Mr. President, I should like to amend the resolution by adding to it a new section in the following words:

> SEC. 2. Resolved further, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the conduct of the cotton and grain exchanges of the United States with the view of making such recommendations to Congress as in its judgment the facts obtained warrant.

Mr. President, on yesterday cotton went off a cent a pound on the New York Cotton Exchange. It lost in one day a cent a pound. That amounts to $5 a bale. On yesterday on the Chicago Grain Exchange wheat lost 7½ cents a bushel. There seems to be in the interest of the farmers no restraining power anywhere just now. The Government sits with folded arms and closed eyes and sealed lips while the farmers of the South and West are pillaged and plundered in this fashion. The New York Cotton Exchange, as conducted to-day, is a gambling institution. The Chicago Grain Exchange, as run to-day, is a gambling institution.

We passed a law to regulate the New York Cotton Exchange, known as the cotton futures act, but it seems that they have learned how to get around that law; that they have learned how to evade its provisions and carry on their gambling schemes as they did formerly. We passed not long ago an act regulating the grain exchanges, and it seems that they have already learned in the brief time of a few weeks how to evade its provisions. Wheat breaking 7½ cents a bushel in a day! There is no justification for that; and we are told that the reason of that was the failure of one banking institution out of thousands and thousands of banks in the United States.

Why should the farmers of the West be gagged and tied in this fashion by the grain gamblers of Chicago? Why should they be permitted to be pillaged and plundered in this fashion? In this country of ours—this great, rich, resourceful Republic of ours—the failure of one bank or half a dozen banks ought not to cause a break of 7½ cents a bushel in the price of grain on an exchange in a day. It was a gambling transaction, pure and simple, and ought not to be tolerated.

Are the farmers of the West to be forced to submit to this sort of thing? Congress is in session. Our Republican friends have a majority in the House of over 160 and a majority in this body of 24 and a President of their faith in the White House. You control all of the instrumentalities of the Government, and in spite of that this gambling revelry goes on.

A bank broke in Chicago yesterday, I believe, or the day before. Banks fail in the South and in the West, in the two great agricultural sections of the country, but they are not breaking on Wall Street. Why? Because your Federal Reserve Board, which is under the control of the Republican Party, is permitting Wall Street to have all the money it wants at 4½ per cent, and is charging the West and the South 5½ per cent. If the collateral offered by the West is good, if the collateral offered by the South is good, it is just as good as the collateral of Wall Street; and if it is fair and just to lend money in Wall Street to speculate in cotton and grain for 4½ per cent, it is fair to lend it to the farmer in the South and the farmer in the West to hold his grain for a fair and reasonable price. That is not being done, however, and yet we do not hear any protests being made by Republican leaders, either by the President or by his leaders in this branch or in the other branch of Congress. How long must our farmers submit to this character of robbery? How long must they be outraged and robbed by the gamblers on the grain exchanges and the gamblers on the cotton exchanges?

Mr. President, we have time for everything else. I see that the newspapers of yesterday say that it is very necessary to hurry up the appointment of a Senator from Pennsylvania; that he must be here in time to vote to seat Mr. Newberry. Two New Yorkers contributed $25,000 each to the campaign fund of Mr. Newberry. Mr. Newberry has cast several votes in this body looking right along to the protection of the interests of the profiteers, against the soldiers' adjusted compensation for the men who saved our flag on a foreign battle field; and while the grain gamblers of Chicago are beating down the price of the farmer who toiled to produce the wheat to feed the world these Republican leaders are not crying out through the newspapers against that. Those in authority are not giving out statements against that sort of thing. No protest comes against the beating down of the price of cotton and grain, but they are giving out statements to the effect that a Senator will be appointed in Pennsylvania within the next few hours to be here in time to vote to seat Mr. Newberry in this body!

Mr. President, now is a good time for the governor of Pennsylvania to say that he will not appoint any man as Senator unless he says he will vote against seating Mr. Newberry. If the American people could vote upon the question as to whether or not Mr. Newberry should have a seat in this body, I do not believe a million of them out of thirty million would vote to give him a seat in this body, bought like a seat on the stock, grain, and cotton exchanges.

Ah, Mr. President, cotton to-day is selling below the cost of production. The grain producers of the West are gloomy, sad, and despondent. They are not getting the cost of production for their products. The great grain-producing West and the great cotton-producing South can see no hope of relief. Nothing is being done by the party in power to relieve them from the evils of gambling in farm products. The grain-gambling exchange in Chicago is fleecing the farmers of the West. The cotton exchanges of New Orleans and New York are fleecing the people of the South, and Wall Street and other special interests are insisting that Newberry be seated in this body.

Mr. President, they are carrying on quite a propaganda now against the putting of one farmer, out of all the millions of farmers in the United States, upon the Federal Reserve Board. The law now provides that two bankers at least shall be on that board, and they are there; but when we ask that the interests of agriculture have one they criticize the agricultural bloc; they denounce us as attempting to pass class legislation. They did not say anything about that when we put two bankers on. I do not object to having two bankers on the board. They said, "If you put one farmer on, industry will want one." All right; I would not object to that. They said the manufacturers of the country would want one, and commerce would want one. I would have every big legitimate interest represented on that board, because if the industrial enterprises are in a critical condition and need money or credits and six members of the board did not understand the situation and were to vote against giving them aid this member who knows industry might be able to convince the other six. If not, he might be able to go to the President and ask the President to interfere and see that industry had a fair deal. It will be the same way with commerce. The banking business would be in the same situation. They have two. Why not let agriculture have one member on that board? But a bitter fight is being made against it.

I am anxious to see how Senators in this Chamber are going to vote on that question, and they are going to have an opportunity to vote very soon on it, as to whether or not the great agricultural interests of this country will have one man, just one man, who is a practical farmer upon that board, or whether they propose to keep the agricultural interest shut out, as they seem now to want to shut it out of everything else where there is any profit making going on.

Mr. President, the International News Service has a statement to-day from Detroit from Mr. Newberry, as follows:

DETROIT, January 4.

Senator Truman H. Newberry has no intention of appearing before the United States Senate to answer the Henry Ford slush charges, and will not do so unless asked to by his friends. He said to-day, "I am very willing to talk if asked."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, is that the Newberry whose seat is being questioned here?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has he actually found out that there was an investigation?

Mr. HEFLIN. This article I am reading from indicates that they told him.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is a good deal more than he ever knew about his campaign. He did not know the primary date within a month.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; he appeared to be very innocent of all that was going on up there. He had no information about it; but I do not think he deceived anybody but himself. I do not think he deceived any of our friends on the other side, who think they are going to vote for him, and they have not read the record and do not know the case. I suppose a few will do that, but I invite them to read the speech delivered by the able and fearless Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. If any Republican on the other side has any doubt about the guilt of Mr. Newberry in connection with the barter and sale of a seat in this body, I invite him to read that speech. Not a man in this body can answer that speech.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is expecting too much if he anticipates there will be any general familiarity on the part of many of the majority with the record in this case. The Senator doubtless has observed in the newspapers that frantic efforts are being made to secure the appointment of a Senator at the earliest possible moment to succeed our lamented friend, Senator BOIES-PENROSE.

How could it be expected, when we are to vote early next week upon this question, that a man could come here to the Senate, familiarize himself with this record, and vote intelligently and honestly? A judge who comes into a case which has been argued would never dare to sit or to join in any opinion. He would want to read the record and would have to have the case reargued before he would render a judgment or join in any opinion in the case. We are sitting as judges, and yet, if the newspapers are to be believed, a Senator is to be rushed here from Pennsylvania for the purpose of sitting upon the bench as a judge to decide this case, without any possibility of familiarizing himself with the record or ascertaining what the facts are.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is the situation.

Mr. KING. That fact illustrates the purpose, the conduct, the attitude of some with respect to this case. It will be decided not upon its merits, it would seem, not upon the evidence, not upon the facts as they were disclosed in the trial of the case in Michigan and before the committee, but along a mathematical line which may be drawn, which is presumed to divide Democrats from Republicans. Such a performance would not be creditable.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Utah.

Mr. CARAWAY. It seems to me, if the newspapers may be relied upon, that one of the qualifications for this new Senator who is to come from Pennsylvania is that he shall commit himself in advance of coming here to vote to enable Senator Newberry to keep his seat. It seems that the administration is making a demand upon the governor of Pennsylvania that he furnish this body with a Senator who will supply one more vote for Senator Newberry, not that he will investigate and know what the facts are but that he will come here bound by a preappointment pledge to vote to seat Senator Newberry. I venture the assertion that there is not a man who is going to vote to seat Senator Newberry who has ever read 300 pages of the 2,000 pages of the record. There is no man living, with the character which enabled him to be elected a Member of the Senate, who will acquaint himself with the record and then vote to keep Senator Newberry in his seat.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Arkansas for his interruption and suggestion in this matter. I agree with him, Mr. President. I do not believe there is a man on the other side, not one, who will read the testimony in this case, and then vote to seat Mr. Newberry.

This is a serious question, Senators. This is the most important issue that will come before this body during this session of the Senate, because I remind the Senate and the country again, if the day has come when seats in this body have become a matter of barter, then the people will not be represented in this body until the situation is changed.

Senators, there is a lot of unrest in this country. I do not know whether a very great many of you Senators over there know that or not, but there is more unrest amongst the masses of this country to-day than there has been since I can remember, and I want to tell you that this opinion prevails amongst them, that the money interests of Wall Street are in control, and they are not by themselves in that opinion, either. I share it with them.

The Federal Reserve Board, which controls the volume of currency and the credit of the country, can deflate or inflate at will, and I prove my case when I say one bank in Wall Street can borrow more money than all the banks of the South and all the banks of the West at one time. What more proof do you want that Wall Street is in the saddle? If Wall Street can get a rediscount rate of 4½ per cent and the West must pay 5½ and the South 5½, what more proof do you want than that that Wall Street is in control? Now they come with a Senator, with a man whose seat was bought. Senators, that is an ugly charge, that a seat in this body has been bought. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], in a speech to which I referred in the long speech I made about six weeks ago, told us of how the people of each sovereign State would go up to the great civic wardrobe of its sovereign household and open the door and take out the senatorial toga and put it, with its love and blessing, upon the shoulders of a worthy son as a gift from the heart and brain of the people of the State. Then he drew a picture of a man building a stairway with gold dollars leading up into that wardrobe and taking the toga down and putting it on his shoulders as something bought at a bargain counter, and that it then became a dirty and filthy rag, and he is right about it.

I would not have the temerity, I would not have the gall, I would not have the unmitigated nerve to occupy a seat on this floor after such testimony had come out against me as has come out against this man Mr. Newberry.

I commented upon the fact that the minority members of the committee investigating his case asked the majority to send for him and bring him before the committee, and that the majority refused. Think of that, Senators! I also said that was the first time I ever heard of a Senator asking for a witness to be produced and having his request denied by the majority of the party in power. Why not bring this man before the committee? Why not invite him to come and tell whether or not there was any taint or cloud upon his title? But they said, "No; we will not invite him," and they did not. He did not appear in court to testify; he did not appear before the committee and testify. The committee did not invite him to testify. He has not opened his mouth in this body, and yet those in power of the majority party, we are told, are waiting for the burial of a dead Senator to name a man to come here who will promise in advance that he will vote to give Newberry a seat in this body. My God, what are we coming to?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has just stated that the committee did not invite Mr. Newberry to appear. It would be entirely accurate to say that a majority of the committee would not invite him to appear. The minority wanted him to appear, and asked that he be invited.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend for that correction. The majority members of the committee refused outright to invite him to come before the committee after being requested to do so by the minority.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I should like to suggest that the record shows that notwithstanding the damning testimony which was introduced, which conclusively established that Mr. Newberry knew of the expenditures made, was a party to them, organized the committee, put up very much of the money that was expended—that is, it was drawn from his account—notwithstanding all that evidence before the committee, his attorneys, doubtless associating with him and conferring with him, announced to the committee that they would not call Mr. Newberry and Mr. Newberry would not testify. It shows conclusively that Mr. Newberry and his counsel either determined that the Senate was so partisan that no evidence in the world would unseat him or deny him his seat or that if he took the stand and submitted to a fair and legitimate cross-examination the evidence against him would be stronger than that which was already submitted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is correct in his conclusion. A majority of the committee must have known, as his lawyers knew and he knew, that it would not do to subject him to cross-examination. It is suggested to me by my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] that if Newberry had testified, then other witnesses might have been summoned to dispute or refute the statements made by him before the committee.

So this mysterious man of millions is hedged about by the Republican Senate of the United States. Shame upon the party in power! I do not care whether it is a Democrat or a Republican, no man has any right to a seat in the Senate whose title is covered all over with dollar marks.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion right in that line?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. When the criminal case was tried in Grand Rapids, he had the assistance of the ablest, shrewdest attorneys in the country, and presumably they did what they thought was for the best interests of their client. Some of the codefendants who were jointly indicted with Mr. Newberry were put on the stand to testify in behalf of Mr. Newberry. I assume that counsel put them on the stand because they thought it would be for Newberry's best interests that they go on the stand. It likewise follows that they must have thought it would be for Mr. Newberry's best interests for them to keep him off the stand.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Ohio for that very valuable suggestion. He is entirely right about it. Of course, after conferring with Mr. Newberry they doubtless said that to him, after he had made a full and free statement to his counsel, as I presume he did, though he has been as silent as a tomb since that and we can not get anything out of him. I presume he told his counsel just what he knew about it, and I think that his counsel told him, "You must not go upon the witness stand," and he did not go. He did not come before the committee and he has not been before the Senate.

Senators, there are some strange things going on in the campaign to have this man seated in this body. I regret to see it. I regret it for the good of my country and in the interest of honest and clean politics. I indorsed the Senate's act in unseating a few years ago a Democrat from Montana, and I indorsed the unseating of a Republican from Illinois. There ought not to be any politics in this body when a man comes in here with bought credentials. We ought to stop him at the threshold. Every Member of the Senate ought to stand with drawn sword and let such a man see them glisten with their determination and indignation as he undertakes to come in here with a certificate obtained by the lavish expenditure of money.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, merely as one of the strange things that have happened, the attorneys for Newberry decided that he ought not to testify and the majority of the committee happened to have reached the same conclusion. Whether there was a consultation between them is merely a matter of speculation and conjecture.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know that he did not appear, as I said a moment ago, before the court in Michigan, and I know that he did not appear before the committee down here. I know that the minority members of the committee asked that he be produced, and I know that the majority members of the committee declined to produce him. I know that he did not produce himself, and I know that he has never appeared on the floor of the Senate to open his mouth in this case. Yet the party machinery of the Republican Party is at work, not to give relief to the agricultural interests of the West and the South, but to seat Newberry.

Oh, Senators, before a deceased Senator is laid away for his final rest, they get a promise out of some one that he will come here and vote to approve the bartering of seats in this body, because that is what it is.

Let me remind you of a piece of testimony. I had overlooked it in reading the nearly 2,000 pages of testimony. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] reminded me of it. An ex-mayor in the State of Michigan was approached by Mr. Newberry's manager or a man working for him and asked to support Mr. Newberry. He said that he was against Newberry. I believe that is what he first said.

Mr. CARAWAY. And that he would not be for him.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. One of them remarked: "You can not get this man with money," or words to that effect. "Let me talk to him." He talked to him. He said to the ex-mayor, "You have been convicted of crime, haven't you?" "Yes." "Your case has been appealed to the higher court, hasn't it?" "Yes." "Well, we stand in with the powers that be." That is the substance of what he said. Listen to this, Senators: "If you support Newberry we will have your case reversed and you will keep out of the penitentiary. If you do not, you go to the penitentiary."

My God, what a shame, what a shame! A man whose rights are involved in the courts of the land is approached by the campaign managers of a man running for the United States Senate, and the poor unfortunate fellow is told, "We will keep you out of the penitentiary, or put you in the penitentiary, according to your conduct in the Newberry campaign."

What did they say to him? They said: "We will know whether you support Newberry or not, because we know what influence you have in this town. When the vote is cast, if Newberry carries it, we will know you were for him. If he loses it we will know you were against him."

In substance they meant, of course, "If he carries it, you stay out of the penitentiary, but if he loses it you go into the penitentiary." In other words, they said "Unless you become a party to making barter of a seat in the United States Senate, we will send you to the penitentiary, but if you do become a party to bartering this seat, like a commodity in the market place, we will keep you out of the penitentiary."

Now, what happened? This man walked out and called up some of his lieutenants, warm friends of his, and said, "Boys, it is to my interest for Newberry to carry this town. I guess we had better support him. My case is involved, and here is what they have told me." They got the vote of that town just through that sort of performance. Are Senators going to vote to seat a man with such acts as that along in his trail?

The papers tell us that a new Senator will come from Pennsylvania and will be appointed in time to come here and vote to seat Newberry. What a thrill of joy it would send throughout the Nation if the governor of Pennsylvania were to say, "I will not appoint any man who will vote to seat Newberry. I am not going to become a party to making barter of seats in the United States Senate. I know what it means. If they can buy 49 seats in that body, which is a majority, why they can pass bills by unanimous vote in the House if they choose, but they will never get through that rendezvous of privilege, that place which belongs to the money interests." That is what could be said then.

Senators, this is a very serious question. If this crime is perpetrated against the American people, they may well tremble for the safety of their country. Selling seats in the United States Senate! A man himself charged with the crime of buying seats! Two hundred thousand dollars they have admitted were spent in the campaign for his seat in this body. They spent a quarter of a million and perhaps more. Now, what happens? We asked to see the bank books. We asked to see the stubs of the checks. We asked to see the checks themselves. They have destroyed them, every one of them. That is a circumstance itself which stamps them all over with guilt and crime. They had them. We want them. Where are they? They say they have been destroyed. Yet we find enough to trace more than $200,000. I believe if we could have gotten all those books and documents, checks and stubs, we would have found that they spent over $500,000.

What did the Republican lieutenant governor of Michigan write to Mr. Newberry? He said:

> They are spending anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000 in your campaign.

Newberry never denied that. But the checks are gone, the stubs are gone, the documents are all gone, the books were burned, and Mr. Newberry has never opened his mouth to explain.

Senators, could a poor man do that? Would the Senate, or any majority of it, permit a poor man to come here and sit with sealed lips and folded arms and refuse to testify before a committee or to testify before the Senate, and then have his partisan friends rise up and vote him in anyhow? Oh, no. Why, they would have had such pressure brought to bear on him that they would have made him testify or he would have been kicked out long ago. Now, why is this? Is it because this man's financial connection is so great? Has he contributed so much to the campaign funds of the Republican Party that you dare not vote against him? What is it? I say again, what sort of times have we fallen upon?

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator leaves that phase of the matter I wish, if he knows, that he would tell us why the administration, why the President of these United States, should want to make the governor of Pennsylvania promise to appoint a man only who would vote for Mr. Newberry? They have a majority of 22 on the other side of the Chamber. Michigan is said to be safely Republican. They could elect another Republican, no doubt. What is there about this that the administration should try to tie the hands of the sovereign State of Pennsylvania, not asking for a man of intelligence, not asking for a man of character, but asking for a man who will foreswear before he comes here that he will cast his vote for a certain man to retain his seat in the Senate? What is the reason?

Mr. HEFLIN. My friend, it is too deep for me. I have my opinion as to the reason. I have hinted at it mildly. I will ask the question again.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator convinced that the newspaper article to which he referred is true?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not heard anybody deny it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I asked the Senator the question. Is he convinced that it is true?

Mr. HEFLIN. I believe that the article is true; that the Republican machinery is working to seat Mr. Newberry, and I am not surprised that they are asking that a Senator be appointed to vote for him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the Senator believes and asserts that the administration—that is the phrase he used—is seeking to impose that condition upon the governor of Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the Senator from New York if he does not believe that is true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator from New York believe that they want a Senator appointed who will vote for Mr. Newberry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think that any such condition is placed upon the appointment of a Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, the Senator denounces this article in the newspapers as being untrue?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York why all this haste on the part of the administration, so alleged by the press——

Mr. WADSWORTH. "So alleged."

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. SMOOT. "So alleged."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Before the lamented Senator PENROSE has even been buried——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not aware of any such haste.

Mr. TRAMMELL. To have a new Senator here within 24 or 48 hours.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I venture the statement that the administration has taken no action in this matter in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor has anybody else outside of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CURTIS. Nor has anyone else outside of the State of Pennsylvania. There has been no effort made to have a Senator appointed and take his seat to vote for Mr. Newberry or for any other purpose. Senators have no evidence upon which to base their statements that the administration, or anyone for the administration, has taken any part whatever in this matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that the governor of Pennsylvania came out in an interview stating that he had refused to be coerced into making the appointment inside of 48 hours. May we not believe anything at all that we read in the newspapers?

Mr. CURTIS. There are many things which we can not believe, for there is a great deal of guesswork going on.

Mr. CARAWAY. This was not guesswork. The newspapers quoted an influential Member of this body as having gone to the White House to see the President and to urge upon him the necessity of doing this thing. Newspapers report the governor of Pennsylvania as saying that he was not willing to do it, that he was not going to be coerced to act within 48 hours.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. Wait just a moment. Neither the Senator from Kansas nor the Senator from New York was quoted as being a party to the proceeding; yet they rise at this late hour to deny it; but, like Senator Newberry, all of the parties whose names were mentioned are silent.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I state again—and I think from the position I occupy in the Senate I know about what is going on—that the administration has never turned its hand one way or the other in this matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator a question. The Senator knows that these conferences have been held touching the vote on the Newberry case?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I do not.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator said he knew what was going on in this body.

Mr. CURTIS. I said I knew what was going on on our side of the body.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator know what conferences have been held on his side with reference to the Newberry case?

Mr. CURTIS. I know nothing about conferences between individual Senators; but I know there has been no effort made on the part of the majority organization in the matter to which reference has been made.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, then, if the Senator does not know what happens with reference to the consultations in his own membership on his side of the Chamber, how can he speak for the governor of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CURTIS. I know this much——

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator is not telling it.

Mr. CURTIS. That all that has been said about the administration taking part in this matter is without foundation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I reckon when the President gave out his interview and said the mainland of Japan was not included in the four-power treaty the Senator knew that he was just joking about it, but the President did not find it out until the next day.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know anything of the kind. There are some other people who hold the same opinion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who believed the President was merely joking?

Mr. CURTIS. No; that the mainland of Japan was not included.

Mr. CARAWAY. The commissioners who negotiated the treaty said it does include the mainland; but that is foreign to this case. I want to say this: I do not know whether the newspapers tell the truth or not, but they have told in this instance a very circumstantial story, and have repeated it over and over again. They have given the names of Senators who called on the President and demanded that this be done, and they have given the interview with the governor of Pennsylvania relative to the matter. As suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, now and then one may rely upon a newspaper. I know that I am as willing to accept the statement of a newspaper in the Newberry case as I am the statement of a member of the committee of the Senate who would not let Newberry himself tell whether or not he bought his seat.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as I said at the outset, this is a very important case. Senators on the other side are now beginning to realize that. I wish to ask Senators on the other side this question: If the President has not taken any hand in this matter, why has he been to the theater and had Mr. Newberry in box parties with him? Why has he had Mr. Newberry in the White House to dine with him while this indictment against him is pending in the Senate? I ask my colleagues on the other side of the Chamber if they do not think the best interests of the country demand that the President shall call on his partisans in this body and ask them to vote to turn this man out; to meet the issue squarely? What is the attitude of the President? He is within a little more than a mile of this Capitol. A seat in this body has been bought; this seat from Michigan has been purchased for a price. The expenditure of $200,000 has been admitted; the lieutenant governor of the State told Newberry in a letter, "You are spending from a quarter of a million to a half million in your campaign"; and Newberry has not denied it. The ex-governor of Michigan, Mr. Osborn, said to Newberry in a letter, "If you deny you know about this expenditure you are a liar and an ass." In the face of these two statements from high Republican officials, what attitude has the President assumed in this case? I propound that interrogatory to my friends on the other side.

When the soldiers' adjusted compensation act was pending in this body and was on the calendar ready for passage, the President took a stand; he came up here and read a message from the Vice President's desk and put that bill to sleep; it was killed, although 500,000 soldiers, who had saved the life of the Nation, were walking the streets without employment, half-clad and hungry.

The President could have a hand in that. The big interests in Wall Street said, "Away with the bonus; we will not have it;" and they killed the adjusted compensation act. I call on the President to take a stand now, and unless he does take a stand against Mr. Newberry, he is bound to acquiesce in the action of the Senate if Mr. Newberry is seated, because the President knows what is going on here.

He came here and told us what to do in connection with the soldiers' adjusted compensation act. Why can he not get in touch with us now and denounce the sale of seats in this body? "I call upon you, in the name of clean and honest politics and against the baneful influence of money in senatorial campaigns, to ask that this man be turned out." Why does he not do that? The best interest of the whole country demands it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I recall the President having taken part in the debate in the other House in connection with the question of whether the surtax on large incomes should be 50 per cent or 32 per cent or a compromise of 40 per cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is another instance of the intervention, Mr. President, of the President in a matter pending in Congress; and my good friends on the other side are excited just now. I do not blame them, for this is the livest wire they have had hold of in a long time. The American people will not stand for the selling of seats in this important body, and it is the duty of every Senator here to fight to the death to protect this body from the corrupt use of money.

Our boys did not falter in the Argonne Forest; they did not falter at Chateau-Thierry, or on other battle fields. Thousands of them died riddled with bullets, standing by the honor of the flag and their own honor. Are we going to falter here? Are we going to permit this dastardly thing to be done in this body? There was not enough gold in Germany to buy these boys to betray their comrades or prove false to their country. Against every invitation offered by corruption and against everything that suggested cowardice and dishonor they stood true to their convictions, true to the honor and the integrity of the Republic for which they were fighting and for which they were willing to give their lives.

What is it that causes Senators on the other side to rally to the support of this man who has bought his seat in this body? I ask that question. Suppose a soldier had said that a man over there representing us had sold out to the Germans, had betrayed his country, had done a contemptible and cowardly thing, do Senators think they could have bought the judgment of our officers who had to try that case? Do they think they could have brought any influence to bear that would have made those in authority acquiesce in the betrayal of their country, in doing a criminal act? Not for one moment. Then, what is it that is going to influence the other side to seat this man? I ask that question again. There were expended $200,000; such a tremendous expenditure has been admitted, although it is twenty times the amount the Federal statute said could be expended in a senatorial campaign. The State of Michigan provided that $3,750 might be expended in a senatorial campaign. This man entered upon his campaign with the understanding from Paul King that it would cost him at least $50,000. When he did that, right then he became a criminal in his heart. Why?

Because he was going into something which meant the violation of a State statute in Michigan; he was going into something which meant the violation of a Federal statute. Then they spent $50,000 more, and then $50,000 more, and then $50,000 more, and how many more thousand dollars we are unable to tell, because they rubbed out their tracks and quit counting after $200,000 was admitted. When we said, "Bring in the books," they said, "They are lost." Then, when we said, "Bring in the checks and the stubs and the documents," they said, "They have been destroyed."

Where is Mr. Newberry? He will not testify. "Bring him in," but the answer is made known, "We are not going to bring him in." "What are you going to do?" "We are going to recommend that he be seated." That is what the majority in the committee have done. Senators, again I say that if this crime is perpetrated here we have certainly fallen upon strange times. We can not put through an adjusted compensation act for the soldiers, 500,000 of whom are homeless, foodless, and half clad. In Cleveland, Ohio, at a theater there was taken up a collection of old coats which were stacked on the stage. The announcement was made that they were ready to be distributed, and soldiers who had been mid shot and shell on the firing line in France walked down the aisle in a theater in their own country and each one took an old coat and walked away. Such a spectacle is enough to touch the heart of a man of stone; it is enough to bring tears to the eyes of the most hardened in all the land.

The farmers of the West are crying out every day that the price of their products are below the cost of production. You do not hear of anything being done for them. The cotton producers are selling their cotton below the cost of production, but nothing is being done for them. Wall Street gets money at a rediscount rate of 4½ per cent; the South and West must pay 5½ per cent. There is no demand from you for fair treatment for agriculture, but Newberry must be seated. The decree has gone forth. The money interests, the corrupt money interests of America, demand it. Special privilege cries out for it. It must be done, we are told.

Why not let him testify? "No; we might hurt his feelings." Well, if his hide is as thick as it appears to be from all the things that have been said in public and in the testimony published in these hearings, I do not think it would hurt his feelings much. I think he is afraid of the facts that would be brought out.

Mr. President, in the statement issued this morning he said:

I am very willing to talk if asked.

That indicates something wrong again. The majority of the committee would not ask him to come before them. Now he intimates that he would have been willing if they had asked him. Why are they throwing that screen around this man? Why is it that this mysterious man of millions is being thus shielded and protected?

I think, as was suggested by my friend from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that his lawyers in Michigan told him: "The best thing for you to do is not to testify. Keep your lips sealed." Now, after the case is closed, and the majority, without his ever testifying, has recommended that he be seated, away off up in Detroit he gives out a statement that he "would be willing to talk if asked"! Does not that make the majority members feel mighty good? He says, "What is that? They want me to testify? Why, I should be delighted to testify if they asked me." Is that what he means?

Mr. President, I said in my speech six weeks ago that I wanted him to testify. I said it was rumored that they would bring him in here at the last moment and think that he could make a prepared statement and get away with it, but that if he came I intended to ask him questions, and other Senators would ask him questions. They will not all be on this side, either. Senators on the other side from Wisconsin, from Idaho, from Iowa, and maybe from Kansas, and maybe from Ohio, and maybe from other States that I could mention, will ask him some questions. Now I learn that later in the day he issued another statement in which he said that if his friends wanted him to, he might make a statement, and it would be a prepared statement.

Mr. President, he is not going to get away from here with any prepared statement. I want to say that to Senators now. He has a right to decline to be questioned, but he can not deny another Senator the right to propound those questions in a speech after he is through, while he sits in his seat and listens to it. A thing like that might be worked in a ward-heeler's court, where "the powers that be" are controlled by the corrupt interests of the locality; but it can not be worked in the United States Senate. Thank God, there are some on both sides of this Chamber to condemn this crime and call it by its right name! You have the majority of votes here, what are you going to do in this case?

In another place he says:

I know nothing of this matter except what I have read in the newspapers, and I doubt that their version of the situation in the Senate is correct, for if it was my friends would have informed me.

Can it be possible that the other side is afraid to talk to this money king? Can it be that Senators in this body, representing the sovereign States of this Union, are afraid to approach this man and say: "Look here, I have taken an oath to support the Constitution and to defend it from enemies, both foreign and domestic. If you are guilty of buying this seat, you come under the head of a domestic enemy, and I can not vote to seat you unless you convince me that this seat was not bought by you or for you. Now, what do you say?" He says: "I decline to talk."

How long would it take a Senator to make up his mind how he was going to vote if that were to happen? Are you going to ask him that? Are you going to permit him to be seated without ever having him say anything? What is the attitude of Senators? What is going to be the judgment of this body when the final vote comes?

I am quite prepared at all times to do whatever my friends in the Senate advise.

That was this morning. I understand that later on in the day he gave out another statement that if advised or invited he would come, but he would read a prepared statement. Are you going to invite him to come? We are told that he says here that if you invite him to come he is ready.

Senators, it is up to you. They can take him in a box in a theater with the President; they can dine him at the White House and undertake to give him standing in the eyes of the Nation, but in the light of this evidence it can not be done. You are not going to get away from this issue. No more vital question will ever come before this body than that of protecting the honor and integrity of the Senate and safeguarding the rights and liberties of the American people by keeping out men who buy their seats.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have received within the past four days several letters from Michigan which call attention to what is alleged to be a fact, that four or five men who were indicted with Newberry have already been rewarded with appointments at the hands of the President of the United States. They have not yet been confirmed, I am told. If that information is true, I think we may have something to say when their names come before the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my friend always makes a valuable contribution to any discussion in this body. If the President of the United States did not have anything to do with this case, as asserted by my good friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], of whom I am personally very fond, why is the President himself appointing to office men who were jointly indicted with Mr. Newberry for corrupting the voters of Michigan and doing an unlawful act in obtaining a seat in this body? If that is not rewarding them, if that is not helping the cause along and countenancing Newberry's purchase of a seat, pray tell me what it is?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator state that anybody who has been convicted of a crime in this connection has been appointed by the President?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator heard the interruption made by the Senator from Utah. I accept his statement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Utah used the word "indicted." He did not say "convicted."

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a vast difference; is there not?

Mr. KING. Yes; there is a difference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the significance of the Senator's remark, then—that because a man who has once been indicted and was not convicted later received a public office there is anything wrong about it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is the Senator addressing himself to me? I am trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I merely wanted to have the thing accurately stated.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Some might gather the impression that men who have been indicted on a charge of crime can not be appointed to office. I think that is not the case. There were something like a hundred men, I think, indicted, but very few were convicted.

Mr. KING. I am not sure as to the number who were convicted. The information which I attempted to impart—and I think I did—was that within the past three or four days letters had been received by me from Michigan to the effect that four or five persons—and I do not carry the number in my mind—who had been indicted in connection with the Newberry case had been recently appointed by the President. They were jointly indicted with Mr. Newberry.

One of them, let me say, has been named as district attorney. Another, as the letter advises me, was named for the position of postmaster in some important city in Michigan. Whether or not either of the persons referred to in the letter was convicted, I do not know.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know that the person nominated as district attorney was not convicted?

Mr. KING. I am so advised; yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know it?

Mr. KING. No; I do not know it, but I am advised that that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know the names of those who were convicted?

Mr. KING. No; I do not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would be most interesting to ascertain whether or not the nominee for United States district attorney was convicted.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator that it has interested the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Utah objected to the confirmation, and I shall continue that objection until I discover whether he was convicted and whether he ought to receive the approval of the Senate of the United States. The Senator from New York need not be worried about what the Senator from Utah should do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am surprised that it takes the Senator so long to find out.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Utah, of course, not having the adroit and alert mind that the Senator from New York possesses, he must pardon his poverty of intellect, and forgive him if he can not learn all those facts immediately.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SPENCER. Only for a moment. I will not intrude upon the Senator's time.

It might be interesting to know that one of the men who were indicted and convicted in the so-called Newberry trial was a man who ran before the people of Michigan at the last election as secretary of state, and it might be interesting to know how the people of Michigan feel in regard to him; and it may be remembered that in that election that man ran more than 100,000 ahead of the candidate for governor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that is not hard to explain. In a State that is almost solidly Democratic or Republican, after a man gets on the ticket the people vote for him, and he goes along and is elected. Why, Mr. Newberry pulled through after he had bought the primary nomination. Osborn got out of the way, and every other loyal Republican from a party standpoint retired, because the machine declared Newberry to be the nominee, and they put him over. I am charging here that when they bought the primary nomination they bought the first step of the way to this body, and that but for the corrupt use of money in the primary he would never have been nominated, and, of course, would not have been elected.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, does it not occur to the Senator that if there is any point in what he is now saying, so far as the people of Michigan are concerned, it is very strange that the Republican candidate for secretary of state who, the Senator believes, was tainted and corrupt, because he was indicted and convicted, should have run 100,000 ahead of the Republican candidate for governor of the State in the same election? Certainly if the people of Michigan, where this thing happened, looked at it in any such way as the Senator from Alabama seems to have looked at it, there would have been something like criticism rather than what would seem to be entire vindication.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to see the people of Michigan have an opportunity to vote on Mr. Newberry since the facts in this case have come out. They covered them up. The people did not know about them. They did not let them know all that we have brought out in this investigation. If they had, the secretary of state, to whom the Senator refers, might have been defeated, and Newberry might have been defeated. We brought out here facts that were startling—absolutely startling.

Coming back to the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I admit that there is a difference between indicting a man and convicting him; but I submit that if I were President, and a man should apply to me for appointment as district attorney, to enforce the law against lawbreakers, against criminals, when he himself had been indicted as a criminal for bribery, for corrupting the voter, for making barter of the ballot, to buy a seat in this body, he would have to convince me beyond a reasonable doubt of his innocence before I would ever appoint him. He has to do something before he gets through this body, unless they have already put him through without anybody knowing who he was.

If the President will appoint these men who have been indicted, if you please, parties to this crime against Michigan and against the Government and against this body and against good morals and common decency and common honesty, is he having nothing whatever to do with it? If I were indicted for a crime and convicted of it, if you please, and you should see me walking around with the governor and eating dinner with him in his home and going with him to the theater, some people would think that the governor was going to pardon me. I think that is a fair inference.

If the President will go to the theater and sit in a box with this man when he is accused of buying a seat in this body, and we have traced to his door $200,000, and the lieutenant governor of his State, belonging to his party, said they expended from $250,000 to $500,000, it looks as if he is trying to lift Mr. Newberry in the estimation of the people.

I invite the President to take a stand on it, one way or the other. If this man is seated, the President must bear his part of the responsibility for his being seated, because he can not defeat an adjusted compensation act for the boys of my country who saved its life, and fight the raising of taxes on the profiteers, without fighting to keep down the sale of seats in the Senate, because this is the most vital question of them all. If we can keep this body clean and free from the baneful influence of money in politics, we can repeal any act that places a burden upon the people, or we can enact a law that has been defeated in a previous session; but if they buy the seats in this body, we can not pass anything through the Senate unless the money changers place upon it the stamp of their approval.

It is really disheartening to see the lack of interest of some Senators on the other side in this, the most important question that will come before this body during the present session. A majority of the committee itself condemn the amount of money Mr. Newberry spent. It denounces it as excessive. Do you think I would vote to seat a man in this body, of my party or any other party, when I had said that he spent an amount that was excessive? What does that mean? That means he has spent an amount he was not justified in spending. Yet the majority of the committee said that in its report, and the minority in substance said he was guilty of buying the seat and that he should not have the seat at all. But the other side recommended that he be seated.

Senators, is this thing to be put through? I ask in the name of the people of America, in the name of the honor and integrity of this body, in the name of fair and square politics in the selection of Senators, that the President of the United States come out and take a stand one way or another in this case. The President can not shirk responsibility. He must be on one side or the other. He can not occupy a neutral attitude. "He that is not for me is against me," and "a man can not serve two masters." He will love the one and hate the other, certainly. If a man were to take me to a theater and seat me in a box I would be under the impression that he did not hate me. If he were to invite me to the White House and have me sit down and break bread with him in that domicile of the Nation, where the Chief Executive ought to stand with drawn sword against the corrupt use of money in politics, I would take that as a sign that he thought well of me. "He that is not for me is against me." He that is not against me is for me, and if he takes me with him and hugs me to his heart, I think he is for me, and the country will, as my friend from Arkansas suggests.

I did not intend to speak upon this subject as long as I have; but, Mr. President, I repeat, before sitting down, it is the most vital question that will come up at this session. I pray God that the time will never come when those who have accumulated their millions can go out and buy seats in this body.

Mr. President, the American people will not stand for that. They think now that the money changers are intrenched, and if you vote to turn this man out you will do more toward disabusing their minds of that impression than anything you can do; but will the interests that bought this seat permit you to do it?

I confess again that I do not understand why you did not have him testify.

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great—

That the United States Senate can not question him about making barter of a seat in this body? Is it his millions? Is it because he had contributed large sums to your campaign funds? Is it because of the great financial interests back of him? Is it because of a sinister program to control this Government and its instrumentalities by the avaricious money changers of the Republic? Do they demand that Newberry be seated?

Senators, can you under your oaths and in the face of the testimony in this case vote to permit him to have a voice and a vote in this body?

I submit that question to you.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I interrupted the Senator from Alabama a moment ago. I have on my desk two of the letters to which I referred. One of them states that Mr. Henry S. Myers, of Caro, Mich., who was indicted at Grand Rapids, has been nominated for postmaster at Caro, one of the best paying offices in the county. The letter says:

Is this a reward for distributing money to gain a nomination for office?

Myers's name will soon be sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Another letter which I have states:

I understand that five major Federal appointments have been made in Michigan under the present administration, and with one exception, i. e., the collector of internal revenue at Detroit, all of such appointments have been from the Newberry organization, and by that I mean men who were indicted with Newberry by a grand jury composed of 16 Republicans and 7 Democrats. Such appointees are as follows:

Earl Davis, recently appointed United States attorney for the eastern district of Michigan; James R. Davis, appointed prohibition officer for this State; Fred. Cronenwett, division prohibition officer, with offices in this city; and Edward J. Bowman, district attorney for the western district of Michigan.

It seems as though the President of the United States, in making his appointments, is more interested in rewarding the friends of Mr. Newberry than the supporters and friends of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I suggested a while ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution:

Resolved further, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the conduct of the cotton and grain exchanges of the United States, with a view of making recommendations to Congress as in its judgment the facts obtained will justify.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is but the opening wedge for loading down this resolution with a burden that the Federal Trade Commission can scarcely carry. We have just legislated on the question of the grain exchanges, meeting the desires and wishes of all who patronize them directly or indirectly. The law has just been put into effect, and they are now under the jurisdiction and regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture. In view of that situation, it seems to me to be somewhat superfluous for us to instruct the Federal Trade Commission to expend a large sum of money—for it will take a very large sum of money—to investigate these exchanges, which have just been reformed, which have just been put under regulation. If the amendment is pressed, I shall object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The legislation that was passed, referred to by the Senator from New York, was based upon an investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission of this very subject.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Federal Trade Commission has investigated these things within two years.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how much it cost the Government to make that investigation, but it seems to me it is simply out of the question to think of starting another investigation, when the ink is hardly dry on the report of the investigation already made. Therefore I do not think the Senator will want to press his amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would not endanger the passage of the resolution of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and as the Senator from New York says he will object to the consideration of it if I press my amendment at this time, I shall withdraw the amendment for the present, though the investigation authorized in the amendment would not cost very much. I shall offer a separate resolution on the subject later on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to express my great disappointment over the fact that the Senate has not accomplished more to-day. We started to work upon the calendar, in which a large number of Senators have a legitimate interest. There are several bills upon it which deserve serious and immediate consideration, many of which could be passed without the slightest objection. But it seems that whenever the Senate does set aside a day, or perhaps two days, to accomplish some business, it proves impossible, or next to impossible, to do it.

Generally, along about the middle of the afternoon some Senator takes the floor and speaks until about 5 o'clock. By that time most of the Senators have left. It then is impossible to secure a quorum to continue to transact the business of the people, and, as has been illustrated this afternoon, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] feels compelled to move an executive session to try to get something done behind closed doors, where there is no gallery to listen to the speeches, or else to move to adjourn; and another day has thus gone by.

I think I notice that there is a plan being followed here, or being attempted. This has been going on for many, many days. During all that portion of this session of Congress which took place before the Christmas holidays the same thing happened about three or four days out of five. The result is that the Senate does little business. I am not attaching any blame to any individual or any small group of Senators. I would not be so impertinent as to do that, but the time must come when the Senate as a whole will have to make up its mind to stay here until 5 o'clock, until 6 o'clock, until 7 o'clock, or 8 o'clock, until it is permitted to do business, else it will not do any business.

There has been two hours and a half discussion this afternoon upon a measure reached upon the calendar to which there was no objection by anybody. I think it is just passed. It could have passed at half past 2. Apparently it has become exceedingly easy, a very easy thing to accomplish, this preventing of the Senate doing any business. An address between the hours of 3 and 5, no matter by whom made, empties the Chamber. When the address is concluded there is no quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. Particularly when the address has been made a dozen times before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the address has been made more than a dozen times before, but I am not casting any insinuation upon any particular Senator. I am merely calling attention to the ridiculous situation where this great body apparently can not or will not do business. I have never been taught that the working day for a legislative body is over at 5 o'clock. Yet here we are at 5 o'clock with no quorum present, and in all probability we could not get a quorum.

I can not help noticing that most of the speeches of the type which I have just described come from the other side of the aisle. I can not help suspecting that it is a very clever and effective way of preventing the Republican majority in the Senate from accomplishing anything. I do not feel like scolding my colleagues upon this side of the aisle or scolding anybody in the Senate, but I do desire to utter this word of protest against such a situation.

We are now commencing the winter session. This is the first working day. We have sat here since 12 o'clock to-day, from 12 o'clock until 5 o'clock, five hours. We might have accomplished a great deal in that time. We could accomplish a great deal between now and dinner time were a quorum present. But the Senators who make their speeches in the latter part of the afternoon have a remarkable talent for dispersing a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have yielded the floor. I do not desire to take any more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The unfinished business before the Senate is the Newberry case. It was understood at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into that any Senator could speak upon it at any time before we commenced to discuss it under the one-hour limitation for debate. I was speaking upon that subject and upon the subject of the condition of the farmers of the West and the farmers of the South and the conditions of the ex-soldiers who have nothing to eat and very little to wear. I think that is of considerable importance. I was speaking on the question of protecting this body against the sale of seats, and there is nothing more important than that.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 5, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, all that we can give Thee in return for Thy mercy and goodness toward us are a grateful heart and a broken service. Do Thou accept these as our humble offerings. The call of the day is with us. Let us answer it with a broad understanding, with wide-awake vision, and even with eagerness of soul. Ever give us that sweet sense of Thy presence that abolishes fear and drives away anxious care. Teach us that many of the experiences of life are to be accepted rather than analyzed. Help us in all things to rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 30, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the governor of Maine my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the third district of Maine, to take effect January 2, 1922.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN A. PETERS.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY PROCEEDINGS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule, with a view to taking up for consideration the antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it, the Committee on Patents would have the call to-day, under suspension of the rules.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HICKS. Not under suspension of the rules.

Mr. KELLER. That committee has a very important bill, which, everybody knows about. The majority of the House is in favor of it. The bill has been held off for a number of weeks, and it seems to me that we ought not to dispense with proceedings to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to dispense with business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 52.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to dispense with business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 184, nays 86, answered "present" 2, not voting 158, as follows:

The Speaker appoints, according to the provisions of law, as members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the year commencing December 28, 1921, LEMUEL P. PADGETT, FRANK L. GREENE, ALBERT JOHNSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 201.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator, the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 423. An act for the relief of Hans P. Guttormsen.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 6998. An act to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917; and

H. R. 77. An act for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6557. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto Rico, and to pay for same out of duties collected in Porto Rico.

HOUSE RESTAURANT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration for the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 254.

Resolved, That, pursuant to the authority of the resolution adopted by the House June 2, 1921 (H. Res. 99), placing the management of the House restaurant and all matters connected therewith under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, under regulations prescribed by said committee, such expenses as may be incurred in excess of those defrayed from the proceeds of sales, for the employment of absolutely necessary assistance for the conduct of said restaurant by such business methods as may produce the best results consistent with economical and modern management.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the same resolution——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is this before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. IRELAND. This same resolution was introduced on the last day of the session prior to the recess and withdrawn at the suggestion of the Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. After making a preliminary statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give me a little time on this resolution to oppose it?

Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman desires it, but I would like to get through as early as possible, and I would rather not yield the floor. I thought the resolution was so thoroughly discussed on the last day prior to the recess that discussion to-day would be unnecessary, and I should not like to take up the time of the House any more than is absolutely required. In substance this resolution permits us to follow the example of the Senate in measure and is the inevitable course we must pursue in policy if we continue or hope to secure in the future adequate service in our restaurant. [Applause.] The resolution provides for the employment of the necessary attendants and waiters in the restaurants, not exactly putting them on the roll, as the Senate does, but to handle them under such management as will permit us to compete both in price, quality, and quantity with the food in the Senate restaurant. It is hoped with the understanding and agreement we have with a similar committee in the other body that a common menu will be devised with prices——

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. YOUNG. I want to ask the gentleman if this is to be a new trust?

Mr. IRELAND. Hardly; and prices will be materially reduced, perhaps a common purchasing department. At least it is the thought of the committee, after giving this a great deal of consideration and under trying circumstances, that this is the inevitable course we must pursue, and have so recommended to the House.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Will there be a common kitchen?

Mr. IRELAND. No.

Mr. KING. Common cooks between the two Houses?

Mr. IRELAND. No.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the gentleman to look into the question of the common cooking——

Mr. IRELAND. That has all been done.

Mr. KING. With the new tables, tablecloths, and all those things it is a beautiful place. Now, if they will just cook something down there which the Members would like it would be a wonderful improvement.

Mr. IRELAND. I will say to the gentleman we are coming as near that as possible in that the two chefs are brothers.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will yield, we furnish the restaurant rent free, heat free, and light free, and why is it, keeping out the question of profits, they do not pay expenses?

Mr. IRELAND. Well——

Mr. PADGETT. Other restaurants in this city attempt to make a profit. Now, leaving off the profit, leaving off rent, light, and heat, why is it that this will not pay expenses?

Mr. IRELAND. Well, it would seem it should, but the irregular habits, the irregularities of the House and large quantities of food have to be provided and then the House unexpectedly adjourns, and perishable stuff is lost, is——

Mr. PADGETT. Can not they keep it in cold storage, in refrigerators?

Mr. IRELAND. Well, it never has been accomplished thus far.

Mr. PADGETT. It seems there is bad management, some how, if it will not pay expenses.

Mr. IRELAND. Well, it never has. I believe the gentleman could convince himself of the impossibility of it by his own investigation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman know whether the proportion of loss in the management of the House restaurant is greater than that in the Senate?

Mr. IRELAND. No; it is not.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it less?

Mr. IRELAND. I have a comparative statement here for the month of November slightly in favor of the House in proportion to the patronage enjoyed, save for the single item of the employment of waiters and cooks, which is absorbed in the Senate and not here.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Everybody who has patronized both of them knows that there is no comparison in the service in the Senate and the House restaurants.

Mr. IRELAND. We hope to bring ours up to the standard of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said he would give me a little time on the resolution. I should like to oppose it.

Mr. IRELAND. Then the gentleman was in a somnolent condition and did not realize it.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to have a little time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question has been moved.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like for the gentleman from Illinois to yield me five minutes if he will.

Mr. IRELAND. All right. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution means just one thing, and that is that the Government of the United States is going to engage permanently in the restaurant business at a great loss in order to furnish us Members of Congress with something to eat. The people of this Nation are not concerned about what we eat, or where we eat it, or how we eat it, or what we pay for it, so long as the expense is not placed upon them. That is a matter we ought to arrange out of our own pocketbooks, and it ought to be in the regular course of business in the competitive commercial restaurants of the country.

For one I am against this resolution. It means that the Government of the United States, besides furnishing us rent free the restaurant rooms, furnishes the light free; it furnishes all the fixtures free; it furnishes the furniture free; it furnishes free the fine mirrors in the restaurant room; the silver, glass, china, linen, and utensils; it furnishes the electric fans in the summer; it furnishes everything in the way of overhead expenses free for 435 Congressmen to get the benefit of on meals they eat. And I say the time has come when there should be called a halt to this kind of business, to this kind of resolution. I say that the people of the Nation are going to hold us responsible if we continue passing this kind of legislation for our own private benefit. The people of the United States are not concerned, in no way benefited, by this. It is not a public measure. It is not a law that in any way benefits the people of the United States. We are in the period of reconstruction, when the people want to know that they are getting 100 per cent value for every dollar we appropriate out of the Treasury. Under this resolution there would be a loss of an immense amount of money annually in order to furnish food for 435 Congressmen, with no limitation on expenditures or salaries.

The gentleman in charge of the resolution says that it is necessary on account of our irregular habits, because sometimes we will not eat the food that is prepared, and therefore there would be a loss to a commercial restaurant. I call upon the membership of this House, in behalf of the people of this Nation, to vote down this resolution. And when we want food in restaurants let us go to commercial restaurants and pay what it is worth. Let us pay what they charge in open competition in the markets of Washington and not seek to take advantage of the people of America by passing this kind of resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may desire to the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON].

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, a good many years ago, when I was a girl and sat up in the gallery yonder watching men on the floor here, and wondered at the things that were said and done, there was a man—I think he was from Indiana; he was not from the South—who made himself a great reputation for a certain brand of so-called economy by attacking the barber shop and baths, and especially the extravagance of towels used by the House of Representatives. He said that one roller towel did his family of eight a whole week. [Laughter.] Possibly in one part of Texas one towel a week for a family may be the rule to this good day. [Laughter and applause.] In Oklahoma we have sent the roller towel into limbo with various other insanitary things that our young State of Oklahoma is at least progressive in discarding, no matter what her politics may continue to be.

But the first thing that impressed me on going into the House restaurant—and there are those who derisively say that I was a "hash-joint" keeper before I came here—was that if I were running it in the State of Oklahoma I would have the officers of the law after me immediately, that three-quarters of the crockery would go into the discard, and I would probably go to prison for maintaining such insanitary conditions.

There has been a change downstairs. I do not feel now that I take my life in my hands when I eat in the restaurant. I am no longer afraid of ptomaine poison. I do not smell cockroaches any more, and I do not breathe those indescribable odors of bad plumbing, of bad sewers, and foul refrigerators.

They say that what we eat does not concern the people of the country. Does it not? Do not your wives quietly look after your food when you are at home? Have I not heard many and many a woman, wives of Congressmen and Senators, speak of the terror they have hitherto had of these noonday lunches?

How much does the country pay for our time here? How much does the country lose when a well-trained Congressman, upon whose leadership important legislation depends, has an attack of acute indigestion or perhaps worse from improper food? Can you estimate the saving of time by the possibility of securing proper and necessary food without interruption of the business of the House? There are a lot of ways in which we save time, and nowhere in the world—little as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who perniciously and persistently squanders the time of this body may admit by his actions—is time of more value. Will you send us out somewhere to hunt around for food? Where, surrounded by parks as the Capitol is, should we go? You know how irregular our hours are. If a caterer has a good meal ready and nobody comes to eat it, it has got to be paid for. The House restaurant is not run 12 months in the year, three meals in the day, seven days in the week, as is the case with the ordinary restaurant, balancing profit and loss with the fluctuations of business. When I started out with the Business Woman's Club, which grew into my famous cafeteria, I served one meal a day for six days in the week, and I lost money right straight along; but I paid the bill, because I went into the business of managing that club that I might pay the bills. So I know all about these matters, about overhead, food cost, service, and so forth, and I am frank to confess that careful study of the situation has convinced me that the only way to obtain safe, wholesome food for Members of the House and for their constituents and for guests and sightseers, for whose comfort the House should not be wholly unmindful is that this action be taken. Therefore I am in perfect sympathy with this effort that is being made to improve conditions, and anyone who tries to make capital of this matter, either here or in the Senate, is talking for imaginary economy and to voters at home, as in the present case for effect in Texas, and not for the real good of the country and for practical economy. [Great applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the only trouble with the restaurant is that Members of Congress demand too much for their money; it is losing money, and if you make Members pay what they ought to pay this would not be true. So you want to pass this resolution to pay the loss out of the people's pockets—that is, the Treasury. This is a little thing, you say, but the real way to determine the character of a man is found more frequently by considering the little things that he does than the big ones. O gentlemen, this is petty graft. If I were going to be a grafter, I would start out with a bigger thing than grafting on the difference between the loss we suffer downstairs and what we pay. O gentlemen, I beg of you do not do this little thing. Let us pay for our own meals. This is such a little thing. It is too cheap a thing for this House to be guilty of.

Now, honest Indian, there is no justification on the face of the earth for having the Government pay the loss incurred in that restaurant. You can not find in your own heart any reason for it. The body at the other end of the Capitol had, some years ago, an expense account that was so bad that they did not dare print it. In the items embraced within the statement of expenses they had "a masseur" at one time, but he is now put on the roll as "a helper," and so on. Why? Because they knew that the people would not stand for it.

Now, I do not think this is going to influence any votes anywhere in the country. The people will never know of it. I do not think anyone is going to make any votes by voting for or against it. I do not believe that. But when you consult your own hearts and your own pocketbook you know that the Government of the United States ought not to pay one single cent out of its Treasury to feed you. [Applause.] If a man runs against you and finds out that you voted for this little graft he will beat you, because it is so little that the people will have a contempt for you.

Now, I realize that when you talk in the interest of people, even about a little thing like this, you do not get anywhere. The fellow in this case does the voting and enjoys the graft. If you do not think that your salary is big enough to feed you, vote to increase it and quit. You know there is a passage of scripture that is absolutely and everlastingly true, and if there were but one such, and only one in the Bible, I would be convinced that the scripture is of divine origin; I would be convinced by that one statement that it was the message of God. It does not say that money is the root of evil, or that money is the root of all evil, but it says that "the love of money is the root of all evil." And it is.

Now, you may talk about the health of Congressmen. The Federal Government itself ought not to take care of the health of Congressmen any more than of the health of their constituents.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman favor the appropriation annually reported from the Committee on Appropriations and regularly voted for by Congress providing for the purchase of spring water, to be drunk freely by the Members of Congress and the employees?

Mr. SISSON. I did not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not opposed it, has he?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, there are so many wicked things that I would have to oppose if I were to undertake to oppose them all that if I did so I would not have any time left for anything else. I do oppose them as they come up. The fact is I have opposed about as many wicked things as has the gentleman from Illinois. He is known as the constitutional objector. I have frequently thought——

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman refused to drink the water? [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I am not yielding now, Mr. Speaker. I have frequently thought, and I say it to the gentleman now as I have said it privately, that JIM MANN is a near great man. If he had devoted his time to the big things in this Government instead of the little ones, and if he had devoted himself to great big criticisms instead of little, nagging, carping criticisms on the floor of the House, Members of his side of the House would have elected him Speaker.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no; the gentleman——

Mr. SISSON. I do not yield. The gentleman there is the whip of the House, and he seems to have become thoroughly outraged. No one has even been called upon to defend the gentleman from Illinois on the floor of this House, and the gentleman from Illinois himself has not asked the gentleman from Minnesota to do it. He can defend himself. I know that I do not get anywhere myself in opposition to little things. If there is one thing that I am wrong in it is in occasionally imitating my friend JIM MANN in opposing little grafts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 129, noes 21.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because manifestly there is no quorum present. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-six gentleman are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members. As many as favor the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 75, not voting 178, as follows:

[Roll No. 28.]

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. IRELAND, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 423. An act for the relief of Hans P. Guttormsen; to the Committee on Claims.

PROGRAM FOR THE SESSION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the matter of the program of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am only stating a truism when I suggest that no important business, public or private, can be successfully carried on, and no important project, enterprise, or undertaking can hope for a successful issue, unless there shall be, so far as the character of the undertaking permits, a reasonably definite plan and purpose of accomplishment. With these facts in mind, it has occurred to me that it would not be amiss at the convening of the session to call attention to and outline, so far as we may at this time, the purpose and expectation of the session upon which we are now entering, following the important preliminary work of the session prior to the Christmas holidays.

For the first time in our history we shall be working in the matter of appropriations under a completely functioning Federal budget system. Our consolidated Appropriations Committee has for the first time considered estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget and will present appropriation bills grouped according to the activities of Federal departments.

I shall leave with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the duty of presenting to the House in detail the plans and purposes of the Appropriations Committee under the new system and of pointing out the remarkably efficient work that has been performed in starting our first appropriation program under the budget.

I think that all will agree that the importance of this appropriation program is such as to warrant its regular and systematic consideration as the bills may be presented by the Appropriations Committee, and while there shall be no neglect of the legislative program, the program of appropriations should, in the main, have the right of way at all times.

There are a number of measures now well along on their legislative way which we expect to see completed during the session. The more important of these is the tariff bill, the reasonably early enactment of which is highly important and earnestly hoped for. Other measures of importance which we hope to see enacted during the session are the bill providing for a commission for the refunding of the foreign debt, the bill providing for additional Federal judges, and the bill for the reclassification of Federal employees. I think it is now generally understood that we shall proceed to the early consideration of, and in due time in this session enact, an adjusted compensation act for veterans of the World War. [Applause.] It is highly important that we shall before the close of the session outline a program of national participation in highway construction covering a period of two or perhaps three years. It is, in my opinion, important and desirable that the Congress shall at this session enact proper legislation for the apportionment of Congress under the Fourteenth Decennial Census.

Other legislation that will be scheduled for consideration during the session includes legislation necessary for the establishment of a permanent policy touching our merchant marine, a measure providing needed amendments to our immigration and naturalization laws, and legislation making further provision for the establishment of more favorable conditions in agriculture. The antilynching bill, which will be taken up for consideration promptly, is expected to pass the House in the very near future.

The enumeration of the measures to which I have referred does not, of course, exclude the consideration of other matters; I have mentioned those the passage of which is essential, highly desirable, or quite generally considered important.

All these things can be done and accomplished, at least so far as this House is concerned, by the 1st of June, and if the two bodies shall reasonably cooperate in the legislative plan, as I feel confident they will, it seems to be altogether possible that we may complete the necessary program and adjourn sine die five months from the first of this week, or June 1 next. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Will there be any consideration of a public building bill at this session of Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. Not for the present.

Mr. ASWELL. What about unemployment?

Mr. MONDELL. We are providing for and remedying that situation all the time. Every act that we pass tends to set more and more completely the wheels of industry in motion, thus affording employment. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify the absentees, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). On this vote 272 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 46, noes 133.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that is pretty close, and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. VOLSTEAD were appointed to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 115.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 75, nays 179, answered "present" 3, not voting 173, as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Additional general pairs:

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. LUHRING with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. DREWRY.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota with Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri with Mr. RAKER.

Mr. REED of New York with Mr. GRIFFIN.

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri with Mr. PARK of Georgia.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Pennsylvania with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I desire to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. CLARK of Florida was called and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state there has not been any motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on dispensing with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 125, noes 63.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is dilatory.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 179, nays 69, answered "present" 1, not voting 181, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. ANTHONY with Mr. FIELDS.

Mr. LUHRING with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. REAVIS with Mr. LARSEN of Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota with Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. FISH with Mr. WEAVER.

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. MARTIN.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13, the antilynching bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to have to object, but I shall have to object to the extension of remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, my interest in the legislation——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will withdraw my objection to the gentleman extending his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my interest in this legislation comes from lynchings that have occurred in my own State. My special attention to this matter came five years ago when at the very doors of my home occurred one of the most disgraceful lynchings and riots known to civilization. That occurred in the city of East St. Louis, Ill. I introduced a resolution at that time asking that the House of Representatives investigate that lynching and ascertain the cause and see if there was something we might do to make such disgraceful events scarce and impossible for the future. In that lynching and in that mob riot there were 100 and more people injured and killed—innocent men and innocent women.

Some of the most outrageous murders known to humanity took place at this time. Little children were taken away from their mother's arms and thrown into the fire.

This affair grew out of a killing that occurred in East St. Louis. There had been race feeling in that city, and there was an automobile containing police officers driven through sections of East St. Louis that were populated largely by colored people, and while they were doing this they were fired upon—fired upon by somebody, presumably, although I do not think it was ever ascertained as a fact, by some Negroes. A man was killed; another was wounded, and this lynching, this murder of more than 100 people, innocent as you and I of any connection with that affair, took place. Some people started out to find the people who had killed this man for the purpose of lynching them.

This legislation, if enacted into law, will cover cases of that kind, notwithstanding the statement made by some gentleman previous to the holiday recess that this legislation is aimed only at the Southern States, where lynchings have been promiscuous. Mr. Chairman, I may say in this connection that that thought never entered my mind in what I have done to secure this legislation. I want to make it so that lynchings of the kind that happened in East St. Louis, Ill., will not go unpunished to the fullest extent possible. [Applause.]

When that committee was appointed to go to East St. Louis, Ill., and investigate those race riots and those murders, distinguished Members of this House were appointed as members of the committee. Among them was the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], and I am glad to say that in all the filibustering that has been carried on here to prevent, if possible, the consideration of this legislation, you have not had the assistance of that distinguished Representative from Kentucky. [Applause.] He knows something about the terrible things that happen in these lynchings and race riots, and how innocent people are murdered and killed by the mob quest for the supposed guilty ones.

I have here the report made by that committee. Among the other signers is the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. This report was published as a House document and I have it here. It tells of the horrible things that happened at that time.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but lynchings have been going on in this country for these many years without any special effort apparently being made to prosecute or to punish the guilty. It is true that some few of those who participated in that East St. Louis lynching were convicted; some whites and some blacks were convicted and sent to the penitentiary. But that is one of the few instances to my knowledge where there has ever been any conviction.

The charge has been made here, Mr. Chairman, that these lynchings are caused by attacks upon women, that they are the result of rape. That is as far from the truth as many of the other extravagant statements that have been made.

I have taken pains to obtain the best possible information regarding lynchings in the last 35 years or more, and I have here a statement prepared by the president of the Tuskegee Institute of Alabama, under date of December 31, 1921. In a word, it says that in this 36-year period, from 1885 to 1921, there had been 4,096 lynchings. Of this number 810 were charged with rape or attempted rape. In other words, of the total number of 4,096, only 810 were even charged with this horrible crime or its attempt. I have taken pains to have other statements compiled. I have one here prepared by the National Association for the Advancement and Protection of Colored People stating that during the period from 1889 up until December, 1919, there were 3,434 known lynchings in the United States. Of that number 570 have been charged with rape or attempted rape—570 out of 3,434.

It is especially emphasized in this connection that there have been many lynchings where the victim was not even accused of rape but in which cases the lynchers gave rape as the cause in order to justify their action. They did this, of course, because they felt that a great majority of the American public would not censure them for lynching under those circumstances; and that is, I take it, why some of the gentlemen rise in their seats and say that this bill should be labeled a bill to legalize rape.

Mr. Chairman, the crimes and misdemeanors with which men have been charged or of which they were guilty and for which they have been lynched have been so greatly outnumbered by the other class that it is hardly worth while to spend a great deal of time on that. In the five-year period, from 1914 to 1918, 264 Negroes were lynched in the United States. That does not take in the great number who were killed at East St. Louis, to which I have made reference. Of the 264 cases, rape was the alleged cause in only 28.

Taking the States in this Union where men are prosecuted for this crime and where the courts are left to decide the question, I have taken figures from the State of New York. I find that in New York County in 1917 there were 230 persons indicted for rape, of whom 37 were indicted for rape in the first degree. This shows that in New York County alone in one year there were nine more persons indicted for rape than there were lynchings of Negroes during the five years where the victims were only accused of rape.

It may be well to state here, gentlemen, that lynching mobs require no proof, but in the courts of justice proof is required. It might be stated further that out of the 37 persons indicted for rape in the first degree during 1907 in New York County not a single one of those cases was that of a colored man.

I have the figures here of many years. I have the places, the dates, and the names of the people who were lynched. Let me call your attention here to the year 1918. Five of those lynched in that year were women. Two Negro men were burned at the stake before death, and four were burned after death. Aside from those burned at the stake three were tortured before death. In one case the victim's dead body was carried into town on the running board of an automobile and thrown into a public park, where it could be viewed by thousands of men, women, and children. One Negro victim was captured and handed over to the officers of the law by the Negroes themselves in that year, yet after that had been done he was taken from the officers of the law and lynched.

A mother and her five children were lynched by a Texas mob in 1918, the mother having been shot as she was attempting to drag the bodies of her four dead sons from their burning home. The crime in this case was not rape. It was alleged conspiracy to avenge the killing of another son by officers who had come to arrest him for evading the draft law. Those are some of the facts.

I have here another year, 1919, in which there were 83 people lynched. Some were shot, some were hanged, some were beaten to death, some were cut into pieces, some were drowned, and in many cases the means of death is unknown. The charges for which these people were killed in that year were murder, assault on white women, attempted assault, insulting a white woman, attempt to pull a woman from a horse, shooting a white man, assaulting a white man, altercation with white man, beating and robbing a white man, being found under a bed in a white man's house, not turning out of the road for a white boy in an auto, misleading a mob, insulting a white man, boastful remark in regard to the killing of a sheriff, and the result of race riots.

I have a statement here for another year, 1920, the alleged offenses being murder, assault on women, attacking white boy, stabbing a white man, assaulting a white man, threatening to kill a white man, aiding the escape of a murderer, jumping labor contracts, Negro labor troubles, riots, election-day disturbances, attempting arrest in connection with a moonshine still, and other offenses.

I have a case here, among others, which shows that two colored men, one 20 and one 17 years of age, were lynched along with two Negro girls, one 20 and one 16. One of these Negro men had killed a white man in Mississippi. For that offense he and another colored man and these two girls—by the way it is alleged that these two girls had been repeatedly assaulted by this white man, and out of this grew the fight and the killing of a white man—all four of these Negroes were lynched from the same tree, two men and two girls, one 20 and one 16.

Mr. Chairman, this charge that this is aimed at any section of the country or that any particular section of the country is in favor of this lynching is an absolute untruth. I have taken pains to gather extracts from papers all over the country, and have gathered them from Southern States as I have from the Northern States. I find that the press and the good people of the Southland is as much against this crime as is the press and the good people of the Northland. It is only the criminal element, the mob spirit, that is in favor of this damnable outrage against human life and human justice.

The Tennessee conference of charity and correction which met in Memphis, Tenn., passed resolutions calling on the President to appeal to the people of the South against lynching, and its resolution concluded not only in appealing to the President but also says that whereas such acts do in fact amount to a crime against the Nation we do further petition Congress to pass an act so declaring and give the Federal grand juries and the courts the right to indict and try these charges thereunder.

That is from the Tennessee conference of charity and correction which met in Memphis, Tenn., in 1918, report of which is published in the Outlook.

Not only that, but I have other petitions to the President and Congress begging that action be taken so that the United States courts may have jurisdiction to investigate and try men charged with this crime. You gentlemen know, all of you know, that it is impossible to find a jury in the county where a lynching takes place that will indict in the first instance or convict in the second instance; but if it is brought into a Federal court you may bring your jury from other sections of the State far away from where the crime was committed.

I have here statements published in papers in those States where lynching has taken place in such great numbers, in which it is admitted that the Negroes are not given as equal protection of the law as provided in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is upon that that we appeal to the Congress for legislation.

I have here a statement from the Atlanta Constitution, which says:

> We must be fair to the Negro. There is no use beating about the bush. We have not shown this fairness in the past nor are we showing it to-day, either in justice before the law or in facilities afforded for the education or in other directions

There is an admission by one of the great papers of the Southland that this amendment to the Constitution is and has been violated, and continually so. Down in Mississippi a lawyer was addressing the Bar Association, and he said:

> The Negro accused of crime during the days of slavery was dealt with more justly than he is to-day. It is next to impossible to convict, even upon the strongest evidence, any white man for violence upon the person of the Negro and, conversely, it is equally true that it is next to impossible to acquit a Negro of any criminal violence where a white man is concerned.

Not only that but here is a statement from the Vicksburg Herald which says that the Herald looks with no favor upon the drafting of the southern Negro, believing that they should be exempt in toto because they do not equally share in the benefits of government. To say that they do is to take issue on a palpable truth. "Taxation without representation," the war cry of the Revolution against Great Britain, was not half so plain a wrong as requiring military service from a class that is denied suffrage and which lives under such discriminations of inferiority as the "Jim Crow" law and inferior school equipment and service.

I have here an editorial from the Chattanooga Times condemning lynching and calling upon Congress to enact a law that will punish those who are guilty of it, dated January 28, 1921. I have here the Dallas Morning News, containing the same thing, and the Independent, of Elizabeth City, N. C., in which it says, "Write me down as strong for this bill," and says that "I would not draw a single one of its ferocious teeth."

The Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News of December 10, 1921, is equally strong in condemnation of lynching and for the enactment of a law by the Congress of the United States. And so with the Dallas (Tex.) Journal, the New York Times, the New York Tribune, and the San Antonio Express, which quotes some remarks by my distinguished colleague on the Judiciary Committee, Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, in which Mr. SUMNERS is alleged to have made a statement—

> That there is not a lawyer on earth who can defend it—> on constitutional grounds. It gives Washington the right to dictate to the States how they shall exercise police powers. There never was a proposition like it, even in the reconstruction days, which permits the Federal Government to lay hands on the States and establishes the precedent on State rights.
> The bill—

This paper in the issue of December 12, 1921, answering the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] editorially, suggests that he worry about the following things: "That in all criminal prosecutions in that State the accused shall have a speedy public trial by an impartial jury; that he shall have the right to demand the nature and the cause of action against him; that he shall have the right of being heard by himself or by his counsel, or by both; that he shall be confronted with witnesses; and that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate; and that no citizen of the State shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, privileges, or immunities except by due course of the law of the land; that no power of suspending the laws in that State shall be exercised except by the legislature.

The editorial further refers to the fact that there is an anti-lynching bill now before the Congress and that it deeply hopes the National Government at last is to take a hand in wiping the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy.

In 1921 the statistics of lynching were published to the world, and in a few days, says this paper, they showed how terrific it had been. The paper says that the National Congress has the power, has the right, to legislate for the genuine, effective operation of every mandate of the National Constitution, and it publishes the editorial in advocacy of that law. The paper also states that Texas has had more lynchings lately than any State in the Union.

A distinguished member of the Georgia bar, Mr. Robert C. Austin, of Atlanta, in June, 1916, in making an argument in favor of the authority of Congress to legislate in the matter, called attention to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and gave it as his judgment that that amendment gave Congress the power to legislate. He said among other things:

> What reason is there for withholding the enactment of laws which will make the sheriff and his deputies amenable to a jurisdiction which is composed of persons other than the offenders and their sympathizers? No one believes that any lyncher will be punished, and experience shows that no real effort will be made to find who the lynchers are. It can no longer be said that lynching is committed for one crime. It is but a few months ago that two Negroes were lynched for killing a mule.

I have statements to that effect, not only from the newspapers in States where lynching has been so prevalent but from the newspapers of every State in the Union, and on top of that it is the duty of this Congress to see to it that those who have been given the right to be tried by the courts and by juries shall be given an opportunity to show their innocence. Even though the law says that the State must prove the man guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, the accused is not even given an opportunity to come into court and have the facts tried out. Gentlemen say that the feeling is so high and so tense where a rape has been committed that it is impossible; but how about the 4,000 cases of lynching that have taken place where no rape has been involved as against the 800 where rape was charged?

Not only that, but the Negro in this country has shown himself to be loyal and true. Every time that we have called upon them to help, they have come bravely forward. I have statements here from North Carolina papers and from other papers showing how splendidly the Negro soldiers from that State and other States went willingly to war, waiving their exemptions, and how anxious they were to do something to help this Nation during that ordeal. I have statements here from the War Department showing what these Negro soldiers did in France individually and in regiments, giving citations, the names of the places where the heroic deeds took place for which they were cited and given the distinguished medal for bravery and for being good, true soldiers for this country. Many of these are taken directly from the War Department records. Take the great war that occurred between the States, and I do not believe there is a single man here from any of the States who will rise and say that the Negroes did not conduct themselves properly when the white men were at the front. Since the colored people have been made citizens of the United States, can we not at least give to them equal justice through the courts of the land? [Applause.]

During the Civil War never was there a criticism of the conduct of any Negro man or woman who was in slavery.

I have here the record of an incident taken from the Congregationalist and Advance of Atlanta, Ga., published August 8, in which is detailed the story of two men coming from a certain section of one of the Southern States, a Negro and a white soldier. They were upon the same ship, the Lincoln, I think it was, one of the transports which, I think, went down. When the ship was going down the Negro was rushing to save himself. He had secured a life belt. A young white soldier from his own section was there and he did not have any life belt. The Negro soldier took off his life belt and gave it to the white soldier. He then rushed back to find another, but before he could do so the ship went down. This paper publishes the statement that about the same time that that event was taking place on the high seas, when this Negro soldier was saving the life of the white man, a lynching took place right down in that county, when the uncle of the Negro soldier was one of three who were lynched by white men.

These are facts, Mr. Chairman, which ought to influence our hearts so that we will do what we can to protect and see that justice is done. That is all we ask. This legislation which is presented is not as strong as I would have it. This bill as amended which is here to-day is one that was written in the committee as a substitute for my bill, and prepared largely by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. I appeal for justice; I appeal to you because it is right; I appeal to you because we believe that if this bill is enacted into law it will help to save the lives of human beings and to protect communities from mobs and these lynchings that have come to disgrace our Republic.

The Constitution of the United States gives to us the authority to legislate. We brought before our committee distinguished lawyers to argue and consider the constitutionality of it. The Attorney General of the United States says the bill is constitutional.

In strong and ringing words President Wilson said that lynchings were a national disgrace and we ought to put an end to them. There have been appeals from men from every section of the country asking that lynchings be stopped. Among those was one from the Attorney General of the United States, A. Mitchell Palmer; another from Gov. O'Neil, of Alabama; William H. Fleming, former president of the Georgia Bar Association; and from men distinguished in every State and all over this country. Those things went for naught. There is no way to keep people from continuing to commit this crime except to bring in a law that will give the courts of the United States jurisdiction and thereby bring the juries from other sections to consider the offense who will not be afraid to indict. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill are simple. One is to punish officials who fail to do their duty. Another is to punish those who participate in these mobs and kill people, and the third is to punish communities in which this takes place. We have precedents for every one of these provisions in State laws already, not only in Southern States but in Northern States. Every provision of this bill is a law now and we are not going into something that is new and untried. You gentlemen are here representing your country and the Nation, and I trust and I believe that legislation properly enacted along the lines of this bill will bring relief to the people, it will help the sections in which lynchings take place, it will help to remove the disgrace from States. My State has been disgraced as well as others. Missouri is not clean. Lynchings have occurred in that State. One occurred last year. They are occurring in all sections of the country. This legislation is to punish those who participate, punish the communities which permit them. President Wilson in his statement said that lynchings would not occur unless the people of those sections tolerated it. We have precedents for this from the States. We have recommendations from leading men all over the country. We have former Attorney General Gregory, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the name of justice, in the name of God and right, I trust we will do the thing that we ought to do and make lynching a crime against the United States of America. [Applause.]

It might be well at this point to read in full President Wilson's condemnation of lynchings. He said:

My fellow countrymen: I take the liberty of addressing you upon a subject which so vitally affects the honor of the Nation and the very character and integrity of our institutions that I trust you will think me justified in speaking very plainly about it.

I allude to the mob spirit which has recently here and there very frequently shown its head amongst us, not in any single region but in many and widely separated parts of the country.

There have been lynchings, and every one of them has been a blow at the heart of ordered law and humane justice. No man who loves America, no man who really cares for her fame and honor and character, or who is truly loyal to her institutions, can justify mob action while the courts of justice are open and the governments of the States and the Nation are ready and able to do their duty.

We are at this very moment fighting lawless passion. Germany has outlawed herself among the nations because she has disregarded the sacred obligations of law and has made lynchers of her armies. Lynchers emulate her disgraceful example. I, for my part, am anxious to see every community in America rise above that level, with pride and a fixed resolution which no man or set of men can afford to despise.

We proudly claim to be the champions of democracy. If we really are in deed and in truth, let us see to it that we do not discredit our own. I say plainly that every American who takes part in the action of a mob or gives any sort of countenance is no true son of this great democracy, but its betrayer, and does more to discredit her by that single disloyalty to her standards of law and right than the words of her statesmen or sacrifices of her heroic soldiers in the trenches can do to make a suffering people believe in her, their savior.

How can we preach democracy to other peoples if we disgrace our own by proving that it is after all no protection to the weak? Every mob contributes to German lies about the United States what her most gifted liars can not improve upon by the way of calumny. They can at least say that such things can not happen in Germany except in times of revolutions, when law is swept away.

I therefore very earnestly and solemnly beg that the governors of all the States, the law officers of every community, and above all the men and women of every community in the United States, all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach, will cooperate, not passively merely, but actively and watchfully to make an end of this disgraceful evil. It can not live where the community does not countenance it.

I have called upon the Nation to put its great energy into this war, and it has responded with a spirit and a genius for action that has thrilled the world. I now call upon it, upon its men and women everywhere, to see to it that its laws are kept inviolate, its fame untarnished. Let us show our utter contempt for the things that have made this war hideous among the wars of history by showing how those who love liberty and right and justice and are willing to lay down their lives for them upon foreign fields stand ready also to illustrate to all mankind their loyalty to all things at home where they wish to see established everywhere as a blessing and protection to the peoples who have never known the privileges of liberty and self-government.

I can never accept any man as a champion of liberty, either for ourselves or for the world, who does not reverence and obey the laws of our own beloved land, whose laws we ourselves have made. He has adopted the standards of the enemies of his country, whom he affects to despise.

WOODROW WILSON.

JULY 26, 1918.

Attorney General Gregory on May 6, 1918, in an address to the American Bar Association, urged its members "to assist in putting an end to this lawlessness." He said, in part:

Lynch law is the most cowardly of crimes. Invariably the victim is unarmed, while the men who lynch are armed and large in numbers.

In May, 1919, representatives from 29 States and the District of Columbia met in a national conference in New York City and adopted and issued the following:

ADDRESS TO THE NATION.

The people of the United States suffer justly under the grievous charge that they continue to tolerate mob murder. In the year 1918 no less than 67 persons were done to death without trial or any process of law, having been denied the right to a day in court accorded by the Federal and State constitutions to all citizens. It is well known that the innocent, equally with the guilty, suffer the cruel inflictions of mob violence. Mobs have even invaded courtrooms and prisons to seize and murder prisoners whose punishment had already been fixed. Early in 1919 a hospital was invaded by a mob and the attack resulted in death from shock of a patient that day operated upon. Local and State authorities frequently offer only the feeblest objection to the actions of the mob, which is permitted to do its will unchecked. Rarely are the members of a mob sought out and prosecuted even when, undisguised and in full daylight, they have participated in murder, and only in a few isolated cases has any lyncher ever been punished. It has become obvious that officers of States and counties are powerless to enforce the rules laid down for the guidance of civilized society unless their efforts are reenforced by the expression of an enlightened and effective public opinion. Patriotic citizens throughout the country feel the shame which lynchings cast upon the Nation, but they have assumed partial responsibility for this shame by their silence and their acquiescence. The time has now come when citizens of the United States can no longer contemplate without protest the setting at naught of the fundamental principles upon which their citizenship is based. They can no longer permit open contempt of the courts and lawful procedure. They can no longer endure the burning of human beings in public in the presence of women and children; they can no longer tolerate the menace to civilization itself which is contained in the spread of the mob spirit.

The undersigned, therefore, as citizens of the United States, without sectional or party bias, with the interest only of the Republic at heart, urge all public-spirited men and women to oppose with all their power the recurrence of the crime and the shame of mob murder; they urge the governors of the several States to do all that is possible to prevent and punish lynchings; they pledge their support to the officers of the law, who in the face of mob excitement discharge their duties; and they urge upon the Congress of the United States nation-wide investigation of lynching and mob murder, to the end that means may be found to end this scourge.

This appeal was signed by leading citizens from all sections of the country. Among them were:

A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General of the United States.
Emmet O'Neal, Birmingham, Ala., former governor of Alabama.
William H. Fleming, Augusta, Ga., former president Geogia Bar Association.
Robert W. Bingham, Louisville, Ky., publisher the Courier-Journal.
Rev. Quincy Ewing, Napoleonville, La., rector Christ Episcopal Church.
Charles J. Bonaparte, Baltimore, Md., former Attorney General of the United States.
A. T. Stovall, Okolona, Miss., former president of the Mississippi Bar Association.
William D. Weatherford, Blue Ridge, N. C., field executive secretary, Robert E. Lee Hall of Blue Ridge Association.
Judson Harmon, Cincinnati, Ohio, former Attorney General of the United States.
James H. Kirkland, Nashville, Tenn., chancellor Vanderbilt University.
Fayette A. McKenzie, Nashville, Tenn., president Fisk University.
A. H. Roberts, Nashville, Tenn., governor of Tennessee.
George M. Bailey, Houston, Tex., editor Houston Post.
William S. Sutton, Austin, Tex., dean of department of education, the University of Texas.
James H. Dillard, Charlottesville, Va., president Jeanes Foundation; president John F. Slater Fund.

I give in detail an account of some lynchings:

LYNCHING—1920.

The number of lynchings of the year 1920 is 65. However, this figure does not include the victims of the election-day trouble at Ocoee, Fla. Though the press reported only 6 Negroes killed, white residents of the vicinity say that from 30 to 50 were killed.

Of the 65 victims mentioned above, 8 were white men and 1 was a woman.

Were it not for the Ocoee, Fla., incident on election day, it could be said that lynchings had decreased in number. But not only have they not decreased in number, but the brutality of the lynchings is still marked. Eight of the victims, besides those burned at Ocoee, Fla., met death by burning. One of these was a white man, at Billings, Mont., who resisted arrest. Another, because he threatened to kill a white man, was flogged to death by a mob of 40 men.

In the last general election the people expressed their wishes in this regard also. They indorsed the action of the Republican Party at its last national convention, when in its platform it said:

We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization.

I include other evidence of the same desire of the people that Congress take action upon this subject. They are as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1919.

Hon. LEONIDAS C. DYER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Permit me to bring to your attention the following resolution adopted by the thirty-ninth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, expressive of the sentiments of the organized-labor movement of America in opposition to mob rule and lynching:

"Whereas President Woodrow Wilson issued from the capital city of our Nation on July 26, 1918, a personal statement addressed to his fellow countrymen, defining mob-spirit action, called upon the Nation to show the world that while it fights for democracy on foreign fields it is not destroying democracy at home; and

"Whereas, while the President referred not alone to mob action against those suspected of being enemy aliens or enemy sympathizers, he denounced most emphatically mob action of all sorts, especially lynchings; and

"Whereas in all wars where our country and its interests were at stake the colored race, with their white brothers, fought, shed their blood, and died in defense of Old Glory, and over there gave their all that others may live in peace and happiness ever after; and

"Whereas lynching, cowardly and unjust, is also a blow at the heart of ordered law and human justice; and

"Whereas the colored people, their workers, their bread winners, throughout the Nation look with hope and anxiety in their hearts to those in the struggle for better conditions, for better homes, and for the good things of life, as well as protection from mob rule and for a surging popular opinion behind them that will not tolerate a laxity in upholding the laws of our land; and

"Whereas the hope of civilization is in democracy; the hope of democracy is in justice; the only hope of justice is in the tribunals, through which justice can be secured; and the only hope of the functioning of these tribunals is in the sentiment which demands that they within their departments shall be supreme and that any effort to incite mob violence shall be regarded as an attack upon the very foundations of society itself; and

"Whereas the American labor movement, American Federation of Labor, knows no race, color, or creed in its stand for the toiling masses to get justice; and

"Whereas through its representatives in convention assembled, at Perth Amboy, N. J., week of August 19, 1918, the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, with a membership of over 90,000, indorsed this resolution; and

"Whereas the great American labor movement through its conventions, city, State, and national, is the very medium through which popular and public sentiment can best be expressed against mob rule and for proper enforcement of the laws of our land: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the representatives of the thirty-ninth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, go on record as indorsing the above as our sentiments in opposition to mob rule and lynchings: And be it further

"Resolved, That copies of the same be sent to our Representatives in Congress and the United States Senate and Speakers of both Houses, and to the press and to the President of our Nation, Hon. Woodrow Wilson."

I have the honor to remain,
Respectfully, yours,

SAM GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

THE BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,
Philadelphia, Pa., November 5, 1921.

Representative DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been very much interested in reading your action on the antilynching bill. We are all very much encouraged by what you are doing on this important matter. You may be interested in a letter which came recently to our board from a representative of our denomination in a small town in Texas. I am inclosing a copy for you. I shall be very glad to help your committee in any way in the furtherance of this bill.

Very cordially, yours,

RALPH A. FELTON,
Educational Director.

HUBBARD, TEX., September 7, 1921.

To the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DEAR SIR: We have a membership of more than 500 who live in the Mexia oil field, who own large tracts of land, and are surrounded with oil wells and gas wells, and the white people have promised to run us out and treat us like they did those Negroes in Tulsa, Okla. We want to know, can we get the church to handle our property for us? Can we grant the church the power of an attorney to act for us in time of such great danger. These are awful days for we poor helpless Negroes in the South. The other day a member of my race was burned in Coledge, Tex., about 10 miles from me—burned by unmasked men, children, and women— and men jabbed sticks in his mouth, nose, and eyes. This act was done in the day; so if we are mobbed and run out we want some one to see after our property.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States:

The board of managers of the Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church hereby earnestly memorializes the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States to pass a Federal law for the suppression of lynching, we being thoroughly convinced that this brutality can not be hindered by State legislation, and as thoroughly convinced that it can be stopped by Federal legislation and the holding of each locality in which lynching occurs to a community responsibility for the doings of its anonymous citizens. We further believe that to-day is the day of days for such legislation, inasmuch as the Negro race, which has been the most frequent object of lynching, has made a record for bravery and efficiency and patriotism on the battle field and at home, so as to make their conduct a righteous demand that the rights belonging to an American citizen shall be accorded them in full measure.

This memorial was unanimously adopted by the board of managers of the Freedmen's Aid Society at its annual meeting January 14, 1919.

FREDERICK D. LEETE,
First Vice President.

The Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1866. Its purpose is the Christian education of the Negro. It has a theological seminary at Atlanta, Ga., for the training of colored ministers; a medical college at Nashville, Tenn., where 500 young men and a few young women are being trained as physicians, pharmacists, dentists, and nurses; and in addition it has 18 other institutions for the training of teachers, industrial and other Christian leaders for service among the Negro people. These centers of Christian education are open to the people of all denominations or no denomination.

In the 52 years of its work it has sent from these schools ministers, physicians, teachers, and industrial leaders numbering over 200,000. This service has cost more than $10,000,000. To-day it has 20 schools, 334 teachers, and 5,702 students. The annual budget amounts to over half a million dollars.

The Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times, January 28, 1921, says:

There will be those who, while objecting to Federal interference in purely State affairs, will not be long in concluding that there may be a Federal issue in the preservation of the civilization of the Republic. The most ardent State righter will hardly dispute the statement that burning human beings at the stake is barbarous, inhuman, savage, and un-American. The Federal Government may without offense declare that such practices are repugnant to the spirit and soul of the Republic, and that those who indulge in them are outlaws and enemies of their country and its institutions. Treason is a national offense, and so may burning human creatures at the stake come to be a crime such as treason. Lynch law run mad, as carried out by this insensate and inhuman mob, is a direct and flagitious assault upon the civilization of the American people and a wanton and unpardonable crime against the moral and spiritual sense of the Nation. The Nation, therefore, may decide that it may, without violating the rights of any State, take cognizance of this pagan savagery and provide a penalty for it so drastic and severe as to render it exceedingly dangerous for future mobs to indulge in it.

The Times, St. Louis, Mo., October 22, 1921, says:

THE DYER ANTILYNCHING BILL.

The approval by the House Judiciary Committee of the Dyer antilynching bill promises early report of the measure. It can scarcely be doubted that the bill will become a law. Its defeat, supposedly, could only result from congestion of legislative work—not because a majority of House and Senate could fail to favor any sober and proper effort at reducing mob violence throughout the country.

It is certain, of course, that public opinion must be the means by which lynching will be finally eradicated. Laws, however stringent, can not be counted upon to curb passions flaming to white heat. It is not expected that the Dyer measure will accomplish the plainly impossible. What it seeks to do and should achieve is the quickening of individual and public sense of responsibility under such circumstances as threaten the setting aside of law by mob uprisings.

Of the various phases of the proposed law that which penalizes cowardly officials and the provision that the county in which a lynching occurs shall pay an indemnity to the heirs of the victim seem calculated to prove most effective in good results. Lynchings successfully carried out could be prevented in a majority of cases by prompt and firm action of the officers of the law. Where all efforts at stopping the mob fail, however, there may well be reparation insured. Knowledge that the community must pay for the wrong perpetrated within its borders will stir many careless minds to sober interest in putting a stop to a rising spirit for seizure of law's powers by a passion-inflamed populace.

The Dallas Morning News, Thursday, November 3, 1921, says:

STATE RIGHTS AND STATE DUTY.

The ultimate form of the Dyer antilynching bill is, of course, not at hand now, so that the objections to it, which, apparently, are largely legalistic, can not be properly weighed at this time. But assuming that constitutional objections can be obviated by the proper drafting of the bill, the purpose of the bill itself can scarcely be considered as anything but highly commendable. Furthermore, reasonable consideration of the history of lynchings in this country, whether in the North or in the South, indicates the genuine need of Federal interference for the enforcement in such cases of order against disorder, jury trial against vengeful murder, and government against anarchy.

The sentimental cry of State rights, in so far as it is a sentimental cry, merits little concession in the matter. States do have rights, rights which are guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States, but States also have duties which are imposed by the same fundamental authority. When those duties are also founded upon the sacred precepts of elemental justice and righteousness, they assume a character not to be borne down by sentiment or technicalities. Such a duty is the duty violated by any State whose agents negligently permit mob murder.

The moral right of the State to enforce its own criminal laws is coextensive with its moral duty to enforce them. The legal right is in much the same position. And there is no doubt about it that by proper and vigilant fidelity to the moral and legal duty of the State to enforce its criminal laws equally and justly lynching would be largely held in check. In almost every case in a community where a lynching takes place there has been gross neglect either of official caution or of official courage in the enforcement of law. The State duty has been neglected to the point where the Federal duty is invoked.

Translated into terms of legislation in accord with our form of government under the Constitution, this principle is unassailable. The necessity of its application is increasingly evident. Segregation and intelligent handling of race questions are palliatives not to be dispensed with, but the strong arm of an inexorable and detached justice quickly and vigorously brought into action is the only means of eradicating this disgrace to American institutions. State rights can be ever so attractive a theme for loyalty or discourse, but it can not be a cloak for barbarism. If we must choose between State rights and mob violence as against Federal action and order, we can not as patriotic citizens hesitate for an instant. The law must and will prevail. As long as State law is competent and effective, then let us have it. But when Federal law is the logical and only resort, then we must call on that, for without law there can be no freedom, no Government, no America.

The Independent, Elizabeth City, N. C., says:

A BILL THAT SHOULD BE LAW.

Elsewhere in the Independent this week I am publishing the Dyer antilynching bill recently introduced in the Congress of the United States. Our own Congressman, H. S. WARD, says that readers of this newspaper "will no doubt regard it as the most astounding news that ever came out of Washington that this thing has been favorably reported by the committee of the House."

I have read the Dyer bill through and through and, like Mr. WARD, I am astounded that such a bill has been favorably reported. I am astounded because it is such a good bill. Mr. WARD, instead of showing indignation over this antilynching bill, would play the better part by getting squarely behind it. If the Dyer bill is a slap at the South, it is because the South deserves to be slapped. We might as well be honest about it and confess that the South has failed utterly in dealing with the lynching problem, and it is squarely up to the Federal Government to step in and put an end to infamies which our own officials generally haven't the moral fiber and courage to effectually oppose. The Dyer bill has teeth in it. It will put an end to lynching, if it is possible to put an end to lynching, and mob rule by law. It will put an end to lynching, because it will make every county pay a fixed price for every lynching within its borders, and make every officer of the law who fails to do his duty a felon subject to not less than five years imprisonment in a Federal prison. It puts the Federal Government at the elbow of every sheriff, constable, and policeman in the land in dealing with a mob. As it is now, the sheriff confronted by a mob is persuaded that he is accountable only to the mob. The mob is to him the State. The mob put him in office, and the mob will not punish him if he delivers up the prisoner. The mob will punish him if he doesn't. The sheriff feels himself accountable only to the mob. Write me down as strong for the Dyer bill. I wouldn't draw a single one of its ferocious teeth.

The Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, December 10, 1921, says:

The Congress is preparing to discuss a bill designed to prevent lynching by punishing the lynchers. Plainly, it is another invasion of State's rights by the Federal Government; but the Federal Government is justified in this instance, because none of the States has made an honest effort to prevent lynchings by making examples of those who indulge in them.

In the South lynchings are numerous and frequent. Georgia, South Carolina, and Mississippi combined furnish more than one lynching a week. We doubt if there is any records to show that a lyncher has ever felt the firm hand of the law.

Under the circumstances, with lynchings increasing instead of decreasing, the Federal Government was bound to take a hand and use disciplinary measures. Whether the Dyer bill will prove effective as a damper on the lynching spirit remains to be seen, but it certainly can do no harm.

Of course, the proper thing to do would be allow the States to control their mobs. But the States have shown no inclination in that direction. At the present time a crime is committed; a mob forms and captures the man who may or may not have committed the crime. He is, without further ceremony, strung up to a tree and shot full of holes or tied to a stump and burned to death. That is the way the law is crucified. The solicitor always announces an investigation will be undertaken. Perhaps it is undertaken, but did you ever see these investigations produce anything?

The New York Times, Friday, December 16, 1921, says:

A BILL AGAINST LYNCHING.

The House of Representatives was to have begun considering yesterday a bill to "assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching." It is drawn on a simple theory. If a State or a governmental subdivision of it fails or refuses to protect the life of persons "against a mob or riotous assemblage," it may be deemed to have denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and Congress may therefore provide penalties. These are, as proposed by the bill, to make it a felony for a local official to refuse to "make all reasonable efforts" to perform his duty in preventing a lynching; to make it a felony to participate in "any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death"; and to make each county in which anyone is lynched liable in the amount of $10,000, to be paid to that person's family, or, if he has none, "for the use of the United States." This last provision is already in force in one or more States. It was recommended for Georgia by Gov. Dorsey at the Atlanta conference of last April.

It is high time that by this bill or some other, and by State legislation as well, a strong effort were made to strike at a crying evil which has been too long a national reproach. President Roosevelt made a powerful protest against lynching, and President Wilson vividly set forth the harm which the barbaric practice was doing to the reputation of the United States. There is no doubt of the sentiments of President Harding on this subject. Foreign observers have again been expressing wonder that a Nation so ready to cry out upon lawless cruelties in other lands should be so apparently lethargic about those within its own borders. Congress is at least trying to find and apply a remedy.

The New York Tribune, Wednesday, December 21, 1921, says:

THE LYNCHING STIGMA.

The House has decided to vote on the Dyer antilynching bill immediately after the Christmas recess. The roll call on the rule limiting debate showed an inconsiderable opposition, most of it from Representatives who look on the bill as a challenge to State rights.

On the constitutional side the power of the Federal Government to intervene is pretty clearly established. The opposition will dwell more on the expediency of intervening and thus tilting the balance further against local self-rule. Yet on the practical side the argument for the measure is strongest.

Our system leaves an awkward gap between the Government's power to make treaties and to enforce them. We are thus often put in a false position before the world. The Federal authority by treaty promises alien residents the equal protection of our laws. But when an alien is lynched and the State fails to bring the lynchers to justice the Federal Government can not step in. All it can do is to apologize for its own powerlessness and to offer money reparation.

For many years a way has been sought to relieve the Government of this embarrassment. It asks of other countries more than it is able to give in return. Any pressure which it may be able to put on the States to stop mob violence will help it to regain its own self-respect. Congress, a part of the Federal power, is bound to take Federal interests into consideration in the matter of penalizing communities within a State which tolerates lynchings.

Even apart from the international aspect lynching is a disgrace too long endured. It is the negation of law and civilized methods of justice. It influences savage passions. It lowers the morale of a community. Since State authority has failed to suppress this evil, and Federal intervention is perfectly legitimate, it is only common sense for Congress to take a hand in making lynching more hazardous and expensive for those who countenance it or take part in it.

The Saturday evening St. Louis Star of December 24, 1921, said:

THE ANTILYNCHING BILL.

It is difficult to follow the reasoning of Representative GARRETT of Tennesse in his strictures on the Dyer antilynching bill, which provides for trials in mob cases before Federal courts and for penalties on communities where the outrages take place. When you place the idea in the heads of a few Negroes, says Mr. GARRETT, that somehow, some way, they will be less subjected to punishment for crimes against women if the Government takes a hand you are but inviting an increase of such crimes.

Mr. GARRETT would obviously like to make it appear that all Negroes lynched in the South are murdered by mobs for crimes against women. That is not true. The records show that Negroes have been swung from trees and shot full of lead or burned at the stake for shooting at officers, killing white men in drunken rows, for crimes, in short, for which a white man gets a few years in the penitentiary at the most.

Just how does it increase crime to have mob trials conducted in the Federal courts rather than in the circuit courts? We wish to be fair to Mr. GARRETT but he, unconsciously no doubt, seems to be seeking immunity for lynching mobs, for immunity is what a trial in a southern circuit court means in these cases. How many convictions have resulted from the hundreds of lynchings in the cotton belt in the past few years, even in cases where innocent Negroes were involved?

Circuit judges are elected every two or four or six years and a mob conviction would be political suicide in most sections of the South. A Federal judge's job is for life and the possibility is good that he will render justice without fear of reprisal.

Does Mr. GARRETT feel that Negroes will be more impelled to crime by a consideration of the fact that a mob that lynches them will be punished while a jury which hangs them will not? That is strange reasoning, but it is the most charitable interpretation that can be placed on Mr. GARRETT'S remarks. The Star believes in keeping the police powers of a State inviolate except where the State has failed to uphold the law and in the matter of lynchings many of the Southern States have failed hideously. It is time for the Government to step in and put an end to a situation which menaces the white race as much as it does the colored.

The New York Tribune, Friday, December 16, 1921, says:

A CURE FOR LYNCHING.

Federal action to stop lynchings may be undertaken under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. In a letter addressed to Chairman VOLSTEAD, of the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Daugherty quotes the following from the Supreme Court's opinion in the famous Civil Rights cases:

"Many wrongs may be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment which are not, in any just sense, incidents or elements of slavery. Such, for example, would be the taking of private property without due process of law or allowing persons who have committed certain crimes (horse stealing, for example) to be seized and hanged by the posse comitatus without regular trial."

The Attorney General was giving his views on the Dyer antilynching bill. Since the fourteenth amendment forbids any State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, Mr. Daugherty also holds that it is competent for Congress to pass legislation penalizing failure to give such protection.

No State can well complain if Congress takes a hand in ending the lynching evil. Our foreign relations have been troubled many times by the lawless hanging of other nationals. The Federal Government is bound under treaties to give equal protection to citizens and aliens. Yet it has no hold on the States through whose negligence aliens are lynched, and punishment for such crime is not exacted. It is likewise an affront to the Constitution that citizens of the United States are not protected by the States in their personal rights. Since 1889 there have been 3,432 known lynchings in this country. Since January 1, 1921, there have been 60 known lynchings. It is a record of shame for a civilized nation.

The Dyer bill, as amended by the House Judiciary Committee, imposes penalties for participation in any riotous assemblage "for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law." It provides penalties for neglect or failure on the part of State officials to protect persons, prisoners, or others from mob violence. It also assesses fines of $10,000 against counties in which lynchings occur. If communities are made to pay for tolerating lynchings, lynchings will stop. If officials can be imprisoned for not doing their best to discourage mob violence, local sentiment will turn against such outbreaks of hysteria. The Dyer bill is drastic. But a drastic remedy is needed for the loathsome lynching disease.

The San Antonio Express of Monday, December 12, 1921, says:

THE RIGHT LINE OF WORRY ABOUT THE CONSTITUTION.

It is too much to hope that the Republicans of the House Rules Committee spent Sunday in solemn contemplation of the Dyer antilynching bill's "menace" to the United States Constitution. They have, so to speak, already burned the Constitution's bridges behind it and left it quite open, quite vulnerable, to attack and destruction by this measure of the gentleman from Missouri! Indeed, the committee majority in effect has refused to look upon the bill through the spectacles of Representative Sumners of the fifth Texas district; has refused to regard it as such a menace; and has voted to give it privileged status on the House calendar. This, over Mr. Sumners's spoken protest, as follows:

"There is not a lawyer on earth who can defend it (the bill) on constitutional grounds. It gives Washington the right to dictate to States how they shall exercise police powers. There never was a proposition like it, even in reconstruction days. It permits the Federal Government to lay coercive hands on States, and establishes a precedent of sweeping encroachment on State's rights."

So, per the committee's vote, this measure which provides sharp-toothed prison penalties and fines for lynchers, and fines for officers who negligently fail or wilfully refuse to prevent lynchings and other mob violence, will be taken up earnestly in a few days—at last.

A Federal antilynching law has been talked about for years. There have been almost as many notable distinct sessions of talk and public resolutions about it as there have been lynchings since men began to keep records of the latter 36 years ago. National conferences embracing some of the most famous men and women in the Union repeatedly have memorialized Congress to enact such a statute. These were conferences of both Southern and Northern leaders in education, religion, business, and government. Great Southern newspapers have been publishing their approval of the Dyer bill ever since it was introduced first in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Not one—and the latest—but several Republican national platforms have called for congressional action against lynch-murder.

President Harding, by word of mouth on April 12, told Congress that it "ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy."

On July 26, 1918, President Wilson put forth the most remarkable, ringing denunciation of and appeal against lynching, that history records.

In the lynching States, all these arrays of spoken and written appeals to the spirit of civilization and Americanism, to lawful government and order—and to that constitutionalism which worries the Congressman from the Dallas district—have encountered but eyes closed against them, minds fast shut against them, ears deaf to them.

Pass the Dyer bill—and enforce it to the limit, with all the power of the United States Department of Justice!

It will need no less an enforcement. Press and public comment; conventional resolutions, however distinguished; congressional debate on the Dyer bill; even the fact that the measure is on the statute books—all these will not suffice.

Take note: Since the latest introduction of the Dyer bill—April 11, last—38 lynchings, including two burnings at the stake and four burnings of bodies after lynching, have been perpetrated in the United States, as follows: Georgia 10, Mississippi 7, South Carolina 5, Louisiana 4, Arkansas and Texas 3 each.

Representative SUMNERS neither worries enough about constitutionality, in this business, nor worries along the right line.

Let him worry about these:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a speedy public trial by an impartial jury. He shall have the right to demand the nature and cause of the action against him. * * * He shall have the right of being heard by himself or counsel or both; shall be confronted with the witnesses against him. * * *

"* * * cruel or unusual punishment (shall not) be inflicted.

"The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

"No citizen of this State shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, privileges or immunities * * * except by the due course of the law of the land.

"No power of suspending laws in this State shall be exercised except by the legislature.

Mr. SUMNERS is worrying about the Federal Constitution and denouncing a Federal antilynching measure.

The Express is worrying about the Texas constitution—the other is in no danger from the Dyer bill—and has just quoted the outstanding mandates of its bill of rights.

In the great charters of Texas and the other lynching States, these mandates track the guaranties of essential rights in the National Constitution.

There is no "State rights"—no State, nor the mob in any State, is vested with the right—to drag these National or State constitutional guaranties in the dirt.

And because mobs in the lynching States thus have outraged the Constitutions of Nation and States for many years; because they continue to outrage them; because State authorities either will not or can not defend their own and the Nation's Constitutions against such outrage, and their own and the Nation's citizens against it—a Federal antilynching measure, nearly a generation overdue, is before Congress to-day.

Like charity, such worry should begin at home. Murderous mobsmen in the lynching States—in Mr. SUMNERS's own district—will listen neither to President in Washington nor governor—urging the "State's right" of upholding the State's constitution—in State capital.

However sincere and courageous the southern governors' efforts to stamp out lynching, they come to naught.

Morrow of Kentucky puts through an automatic removal law against officers derelict in the face of mobs, and employs State soldiery to prevent lynching—but lynching goes on in Kentucky.

McRae, of Arkansas, demands most stringent laws and their enforcement against lynchers—and has his labor for his pains.

Cooper, of South Carolina, made a Nation-wide reputation by his use of National Guard against would-be lynchers—but lynching goes on in his State.

Under the fearless administration of Bickett, that great defense of the Goldsboro courthouse against the mob became practically possible—but lynching goes on in North Carolina.

Dorsey, of Georgia, organized a State-wide movement against continuance of the foulest and longest of all lynching records—and the country didn't know whether to expect his impeachment or his lynching.

In 1919 Hobby, as governor, and Cureton, as attorney general of Texas, proceeded against a lynch mob in Hill County—but, so far as the Express knows, the information filed thereon never has been called up from the court docket.

Two years later a couple of lynchers in East Texas were tried on reduced charges, convicted—and granted suspended sentence!

And now Gov. Neff goes up and down the State appealing for law enforcement, for order, and the cure of an anticonstitutional condition infinitely graver than that which concerns Congressman SUMNERS.

And so there is an antilynching law before Congress and, the Express deeply hopes, the National Government at last is to take a hand in wiping "the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy."

The 1921 statistics of lynching will be published to the world in a few days, and they will be, as usual, terrific.

Meanwhile, the 1920 record stands as the basis of indictment and comparison—and Texas heads that record. Last year its mobs out lynched Georgia's by one murder.

If Representative SUMNERS is looking for something to worry about on the score of "constitutional guaranties," there is his chance.

The National Congress has both the right and the power to legislate for the genuine, effective operation of every mandate of the National Constitution.

Pass the Dyer antilynching bill.

The San Antonio Express of December 22 says:

"STATE RIGHTS?"

"When less than 200 Members answered to their names on one roll call Speaker GILLETT declared that Democrats opposed to the (antilynching) bill were obstructing its consideration by leaving the Chamber and thus preventing a quorum. An agreement to postpone consideration of the bill until after the Christmas recess was reached after several hours of ineffectual efforts to maintain a quorum." (Washington news of December 21.)

What matter a few hours wasted on filibustering roll calls or a few more days' delay in getting action on the Dyer bill, comparatively?

Here is a "roll call" extending over 36½ years—from January 1, 1885, to June 30, 1921—and 10 days hence there will be a roll call covering 37 years:

Alabama, 261; Arizona, 12; Arkansas, 223; California, 33; Colorado, 25; Connecticut, 1; Delaware, 1; Florida, 184; Georgia, 437; Idaho, 8; Illinois, 26; Indiana, 31; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 37; Kentucky, 168; Louisiana, 291; Maryland, 23; Michigan, 5; Minnesota, 6; Mississippi, 410; Missouri, 86; Montana, 21; Nebraska, 30; Nevada, 6; New Jersey, 1; New Mexico, 16; New York, 2; North Carolina, 73; North Dakota, 3; Ohio, 20; Oklahoma, 84; Oregon, 10; Pennsylvania, 6; South Carolina, 122; South Dakota, 15; Tennessee, 199; Texas, 304; Virginia, 76; Washington, 14; West Virginia, 37; Wisconsin, 5; Wyoming, 17.

That roll call, those figures, are the roll call and figures of lynchings—of "hangings without trial," as Senator WATSON of Georgia unwillingly would have to concede, even while cutting up about what happened to soldiers in France.

Do the southern Democratic Senators who are fighting the Dyer bill desire to characterize the foregoing as a record of "State rights," under either the Federal or the State constitutions?

And, again, in the face of that record, do they desire to make the world believe that Representative DYER and the Republican congressional majority are picking on the erstwhile "solid" Democratic South per this antilynching measure?

It was only last year that six States more or less remote from the South were messed up in the lynching record—California, Illinois, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, and Ohio. It is probable—barely so—that their people would like to see their Nation's Constitution, and incidentally their respective State constitutions, upheld thereabouts by national law at the hands of national officers.

The New York Evening Post of December 27, 1921, says:

THE ANTILYNCHING LAW.

It will be for the Supreme Court to decide whether the proposed Federal antilynching law, of the enactment of which the congressional leaders are confident, is valid under the Constitution. Chairman MONDELL admits that on this point there is room for a difference of opinion. So there is a difference of opinion about many laws that break with precedent under the compulsion of necessity. That is what the Supreme Court is for. There are those who felt just as strongly about the unconstitutionality of prohibition as they do about the lynching law, but the court has made its decision.

Even if the antilynching law should be declared invalid by the Supreme Court, its mere enactment will have gone far to serve its purpose. Notice will have been served on States which have been derelict in their duty that the conscience of the Nation will not tolerate the perpetuation of an abuse and a crime that make us a byword in the public opinion of mankind. It is argued by the World this morning that no proof exists that the States as such have legalized or tolerated lynching. Yet we have the fact that in 1920 the mobs took 61 lives and in the present year 63 lives. There is no escape from the alternative that the States are either unable or unwilling to suppress mob murder. In either case the intervention of the Federal Government would be justified.

We come back in this instance to the solemn warning served upon the States by Elihu Root several years ago. The States can not fail in their elementary duties of civilized government without seeing the Federal Government step in to supply the necessary guaranties. Suppression of the practice of burning human beings at the stake would seem to fall within the purview of a Constitution enacted for the purpose of establishing justice and insuring domestic tranquillity.

While the Negro soldiers in large numbers were fighting and dying in France, their relatives at home were being lynched. Numerous instances of this have come to my attention. Some of the bravest men in the late war were black men, as the following facts indicate.

Distinguished service crosses were awarded by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces for extraordinary heroism in action in France to the following-named colored officers and enlisted men:

Charles G. Young, first lieutenant, Three hundred and sixty-eighth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Binarville, France, September 27 and 28, 1918. While in command of a scout platoon he was twice severely wounded from shell fire, but refused medical attention and remained with his men, helping to dress their wounds and to evacuate his own wounded during the entire night, and holding firmly his exposed position covering the right flank of his battalion.

Harvey W. Wilson, second lieutenant, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Bussy Farm, France, September 28 and 29, 1918. After being hit by a shell splinter he continued to lead his platoon against the enemy position until he was again hit by another shell fragment and had to be carried from the field. His example of devotion to duty and his courage inspired the men of the platoon to continue the attack successfully.

Ira M. Payne, sergeant, Company A, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Sechault, France, September 29, 1918. Having found a machine gun hidden in a brush which was causing serious casualties to his company, he crept up, killed the gunners with his rifle, and captured the gun.

Roy A. Brown, sergeant, Company E, Three hundred and sixty-sixth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Lesseau, France, September 4, 1918. He was a member of a combat group which was attacked by 20 of an enemy raiding party, advancing under a heavy barrage, and using liquid fire. The sergeant in charge of the group was killed and several others, including Sergt. Brown, were wounded. Nevertheless this soldier, with three others, fearlessly resisted the enemy until they were driven off.

Clifton Merrimon, corporal, Company L, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Bussy Farm, France, September 27, 1918. He attacked with hand grenades an enemy machine gun which was causing heavy losses to his platoon, and succeeded in killing the gunner and putting the gun out of action. He then organized the remainer of the platoon and led them to their positions in the trenches south of Bussy Farm.

Van Horton, corporal, Company E, Three hundred and sixty-sixth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Lesseux, France, September 4, 1918. During a hostile attack, preceded by a heavy minnenwerfer barrage, involving the entire front of the battalion, the combat group to which this courageous soldier belonged was attacked by about 20 of the enemy, using liquid fire. The sergeant in charge of the group and four other men having been killed, he fearlessly rushed to receive the attack and the persistency with which he fought resulted in stopping the attack and driving back the enemy.

Lewis Watkins, private, first class, Company A, Three hundred and fiftieth Machine Gun Battalion. For extraordinary heroism in action near Eply, France, November 4, 1918. He accompanied an infantry patrol, acting as gunner with a heavy machine gun. When a large party of the enemy had worked around the flank of the patrol and was advancing across a road along which the patrol was withdrawing he went into action with his gun at a range of less than 100 yards, although the order to withdraw had been given. Displaying exceptional coolness and bravery under heavy rifle and machine-gun fire, he succeeded in dispersing the enemy. He was the last of the patrol to retire.

George Bell, private, Company E, Three hundred and sixty-sixth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Lesseau, France, September 4, 1918. Although he was severely wounded, he remained at his post and continued to fight a superior enemy force which had attempted to enter our lines, thereby preventing the success of an enemy raid in force.

Alex Hammond, private, Company E, Three hundred and sixty-sixth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Lesseau, France, September 4, 1918. Although he was severely wounded, he remained at his post and continued to fight a superior force which had attempted to enter our lines, thereby preventing the success of any enemy raid in force.

Bernard Lewis, private, Company A, Three hundred and sixty-eighth Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Binarville, France, September 30, 1918. During an attack on Binarville he volunteered to go down the road that leads into the village to rescue a wounded soldier of his company. To accomplish his mission he was compelled to go under heavy machine-gun and shell fire. In total disregard of personal danger he brought the wounded man safely to our lines.

Clifford Crawford, private, Headquarters Company, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Bussy Farm, France, September 28–29, 1918. He was acting as liaison agent between regimental headquarters and the battalion. Having carried a message through a heavy bombardment to the commander of a battalion which was about to make an attack, he joined the first wave of the attack and dashed into the enemy's trenches. Seeing two of the enemy rush to a dugout, he followed them and brought 10 prisoners from the dugout, killing 2 who tried to escape.

George Gross, private, Company D, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Sechault, France, September 29, 1918. Although he had been badly gassed, he kept his machine gun in action until he fell beside his gun.

Samuel H. Johns, private, Company L, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Bussy Farm, France, September 28, 1918. After several other runners had been killed or wounded he volunteered to carry a message over fields swept by heavy machine-gun fire and artillery bombardment. He succeeded in delivering the message, but was severely wounded while on the return trip.

Clarence R. Van Allen, private, Company L, Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. For extraordinary heroism in action near Bussy Farm, France, September 28, 1918. This soldier, unassisted, rushed an enemy machine gun, putting it out of action and capturing three prisoners.

Colored soldiers fought with especial distinction in France in the Forest of Argonne, at Chateau-Thierry, in Belleau Wood, St. Mihiel district, Champagne sector, Metz, Vosges, and so forth, winning praise from French and American commanders. Colored troops were nearest the Rhine when the armistice was signed.

Entire regiments of colored troops cited for exceptional valor and decorated with the French croix de guerre—Three hundred and sixty-ninth, Three hundred and seventy-first, and Three hundred and seventy-second; groups of officers and men of the Three hundred and sixty-fifth, Three hundred and sixty-sixth, Three hundred and sixty-eighth, and Three hundred and seventieth were likewise decorated; First Battalion of the Three hundred and sixty-seventh also decorated with croix de guerre.

Many individuals, like Harry Johnson, Needham Roberts, and William Butler awarded croix de guerre and distinguished service cross, and scores of officers earned promotions in their military units.

The Charlotte (N. C.) News says:

It is the marvel of the South, as it ought to be the admiration of the whole United States, that when the colored man in the hard stages of the war, through which we are beginning to pass, is being put to the test, he is measuring up to the full valuation of a citizen and a patriot. There has been nothing wanting about him. In every activity to which the mind of the country has been directed since it was committed by its great President to war, the Negro has fulfilled his obligation. There has not only been a total absence of resistance, but there has been rather a hearty response to every appeal of the Government, a thorough fitting in with every enterprise that had of necessity to be founded, first of all, upon a spirit of patriotism. These multiplied diversities need not be enumerated. What the colored man has done is made all the more glittering by what he has refused to do. His efforts and activities speak in terms of eloquence that become the despair of those who seek to portray them.

And to these words I add from the Charleston News and Courier the following:

The Negroes have met the first test admirably. Both the drafted men and the Negro leaders of South Carolina have earned the commendation of them which is being freely voiced by white citizens everywhere. The leaders have realized, as it was hoped they would, that in a way their race is on trial. Evidently they are determined that it shall acquit itself well.

Sections 5 and 6, penalizing communities, does nothing more than adopt the South Carolina and Ohio laws, imposing a penalty on the county in which the laws against lynching have failed of enforcement; and such laws have been held constitutional in both States by their respective supreme courts, the law of South Carolina in Brown v. Orangeburg County (55 S. C., 45; 32 S. E., 764); and the Ohio law in Commissioners v. Church (62 Ohio St., 318).

As to the constitutionality of statutes imposing a penalty upon counties or municipalities for lynching or mob violence, the following additional authorities are submitted: Dale County v. Gunter (46 Ala., 111); De Kalb v. Smith (47 Ala., 407); Cantey v. Clarendon County (101 S. C., 141); Atchison v. Twine (9 Kans., 350); Cherryvale v. Hawman (80 Kans., 170; 23 L. R. A. (N. S.), 645); P., C., C. & L. Ry. Co. v. Chicago (242 Ill., 178; 44 L. R. A. (N. S.), 358; 11 Cyc., 500, 501).

A strong argument for this remedy for an admitted evil is in the following words from the opinion of the Supreme Court of South Carolina:

It has been held that statutes making a community liable for damages in cases of lynchings, and giving a right of recovery to the legal representatives of the person lynched, are valid on the ground that the main purpose is to impose a penalty on the community, which is given to the legal representatives not because they have been damaged, but because the legislature sees fit thus to dispose of the penalty. Such statutes are salutary, as their effect is to render protection to human life and make communities law-abiding.

(West Virginia, Laws 1921, c. 96.)

Five or more persons "assembled for the unlawful purpose of offering violence to the person or property of anyone supposed to have been guilty of a violation of law, or for the purpose of exercising correctional powers or regulative powers over any person or persons by violence, and without lawful authority, shall be regarded and designated as a 'mob' or 'riotous assemblage.'" Every person participating in a riotous assemblage which puts another person to death is guilty of murder. Persons participating in mobs intending to inflict damage to person or property of persons charged with crime are subject to fine of from $100 to $1,000 and imprisonment from 30 days to 12 months. Members of mobs actually inflicting such damage are liable to penitentiary sentence of from 1 to 10 years. The injured person has a right of action against the city or county for damages to the amount of $5,000. Where a person has been killed, his personal representative may recover $5,000 from the county, action to be brought in a State court, and if the amount is not paid a tax may be levied against the county for its collection. The county may recover on the official bond of any officer responsible for protection of the injured person, if guilty of negligence.

Now, specially as to our authority to legislate as provided in this bill, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution imposes this duty upon Congress: That amendment provides that no State "shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," and further provides that "the Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." It is well settled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the denial forbidden is not alone a denial by positive legislation, but that "no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is thus made the duty of the Congress under the Constitution to enact such laws as may be needful to assure that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Within the limits of the jurisdiction thus conferred, the Congress has the right to exercise its discretion as to what laws or what means can best accomplish the desired end.

In many cases of lynching the person put to death is taken by a mob from the sheriff, marshal, or other police officer of the State, whose failure to defend and protect him denies to him the equal protection of the laws.

In Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339, 346) the Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion by Mr. Justice Strong, speaking of the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment, says:

They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a State, by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken. A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision therefore must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons; and to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured. (See also the very recent cases of Home Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S., 278, 290; Buchanan v. Worley, 245 U. S., 60, 77.)

A distinguished southern judge has given this definition:

By "equal protection of the laws" is meant equal security under them to everyone in his life, his liberty, his property, and in the pursuit of happiness. It not only implies the right of each to resort on the same terms with others to the courts of the country for the security of his person and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts, but also his exemption from any greater burdens and charges than such as are equally imposed on all others under like circumstances.

The Supreme Court of the United States says of this provision:

When the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intent of the laws as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners as to all other persons by the broad and benign provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.

In another case the same court said:

An actual discrimination against a Negro, on account of his race, by officers intrusted with the duty of carrying out the law is as potential in creating a denial of equality of rights as a discrimination made by law.

Hon. Morefield Storey, a distinguished lawyer of Boston, Mass., writing concerning this bill, says:

I think that it should be supported under the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as well as under the fourteenth. The fifth amendment provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and this applies to everyone within the jurisdiction of the United States. It is a shield which the Constitution throws over every person, citizen or not, within our jurisdiction, and I can not doubt that Congress has the power to enforce this provision like every other provision of the Constitution. Nothing can be more fundamental than the rights thus protected which are declared by the Declaration of Independence to be inalienable, and which in great part our Government was formed to maintain.

Under the fourteenth amendment and the decisions there is unquestionably a citizenship of the United States. That amendment provides that the persons therein described shall be citizens of the United States and of the State in which they reside, but their citizenship of the United States is placed first. The United States demands of them military service, and taxes them directly in both cases without requiring the interposition of the State government. In so doing it treats them as directly responsible to the Federal Government, and the rule is general that the Government owes its protection to its citizens and those who owe it allegiance.

Assistant Attorney General Goff gave it as his opinion in a lengthy argument before the Committee on the Judiciary, that this bill was constitutional in all particulars. He cited many decisions of the courts and gave many good reasons for his opinion. I have called attention to this in the report which I filed with the bill. Among other things, he said:

Must the Congress of this country sit supinely by when it knows that a State, either affirmatively or negatively, is denying that right? If the State omits to give or withholds protection through motives of indifference or inability, is the guaranty performed and the duty of the Federal Government discharged? In a word, is the fourteenth amendment meaningless because of State negativity? I hope not, and I think not. The Congress of the United States clearly is charged under the Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, with the duty of seeing that the States do not neglect this right. Then, if the Congress of the United States decides that the States have, by omission, neglect, incapacity, or local prejudice, if you please, failed to insure and secure to every citizen within those States the full protection of the laws and the right to life, liberty, and property, then does not the obligation arise to protect these rights?

The Attorney General of the United States indorses the bill and the opinion of Col. Goff.

I also submit the following opinion by the Hon. Albert E. Pillsbury, formerly attorney general of the State of Massachusetts:

[Reprinted in the Crisis by special permission from the Harvard Law Review, vol. 15, No. 9.]

Has the United States power to protect the lives of its citizens, or the lives of resident aliens to whom it owes protection, against mob violence within the States, if the States fail to protect them?

Probably a majority of public men and constitutional lawyers, "under prepossession of some abstract theory of the relations between the State and National Governments," as Mr. Justice Bradley once said in the Supreme Court (ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 383), will incline to answer this question off hand in the negative.

An off-hand answer is not enough. The progress of mob law in many of the States invites, if it does not compel, a serious inquiry into the constitutional question of Federal power to put an end to it. This is not a sectional question, nor is it to be approached in a narrow or sectional spirit. The fact that the victims of lynching are usually of the colored race does not limit the importance or the object of the inquiry. It is not a race question, but one which affects the integrity of the Government. Lynch law is actual and concrete anarchy; the one complete form in which anarchism appears in our midst. The United States can not afford to tolerate it within the national domain if the power of prevention exists. It is idle to denounce anarchism in the abstract, or to punish by special laws the killing of Presidents or other officers of Government by anarchists, in a community where there is no system of laws adequate to protect the life of any and every person against mob violence.

The demoralizing effect of lynching upon the public moral sense is enough to compel attention to the subject, if there were no other reason for it. The practice is steadily increasing, by methods of progressive barbarity. When Hose was burned at the stake in Newman some 10 years ago a cry of indignation went up from press and people in all parts of the country. Burning alive was comparatively a novelty, even in Judge Lynch's code of punishments. Since that occurrence many lynchings have been perpetrated by burning, and they have excited hardly a word of public comment. Such statistics as have been collected, probably not full nor entirely accurate, indicate that there were more murders by mob violence within the States during the last year than in any year before, and that in but about one-tenth of these cases was there even a charge of the peculiar crime to which lynching is sometimes considered especially appropriate.

As a legal or political question the character or degree of guilt on the part of the victim of the mob can not enter into it. If the guiltier man is lynched to-day, the less guilty man may be to-morrow, and the innocent man the next day. In fact, a substantial proportion of the victims are innocent of any offense. A mob can not be trusted to determine this question, and often makes no attempt to determine it. It is less revolting if the mob kills the perpetrator of a heinous crime than if it kills for a trivial offense or no offense at all. But one case involves as much danger to the political system as the other. No civilized community can suffer vengeance to be wreaked or penalties to be visited upon any person by lawless violence. The possible consequences of tolerating such a practice do not need even to be suggested.

It is not agreeable to reflect that lynching, as the Chinese minister has pointedly reminded us, is peculiarly an American custom. It does not, and could not, exist under any other Government in the world having any pretensions to be called civilized. Not in Spain, Russia, or even Turkey, are men and women burned at the stake by mobs, with or without charges of crime. The American States enjoy a complete monopoly of this distinction. The weight of public sentiment in every State undoubtedly is against it. The better element of the people in every State would prevent it. But for one reason or another the States do not prevent it, and it has generally been supposed that the Federal Government has no power to interfere.

A bill some time ago was introduced in each House of Congress designed to afford to citizens Federal protection against lynching in default of protection by the States (57th Cong., 1st sess., S. 1117; H. R. 4572). In substance it provides, in section 1, that the putting to death of a citizen of the United States by a mob in default of protection of such citizen by the State or its officers shall be deemed a denial to the citizen by the State of the equal protection of the laws and a violation of the peace of, and offense against, the United States; in section 2, that every person participating in such mob shall be deemed guilty of murder and subject to prosecution therefor in the Federal courts; in section 3, that the county in which a lynching occurs shall be subject to a pecuniary forfeiture, to be recovered by action prosecuted by and in the name of the United States; in section 4, that State peace officers who omit all reasonable efforts to prevent a lynching, and prosecuting officers who omit all reasonable efforts to bring the offenders to justice under the laws of the State, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States and be liable to prosecution and punishment therefor in the Federal courts; and in section 5, that State officers having the custody of citizens of the United States charged with crime, who suffer them to be taken from their custody by mobs for the purpose of lynching, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States and be liable to Federal prosecution and punishment. Section 6 provides for the exclusion from juries in such cases of all persons whose character, conduct, or opinions are such as to disqualify them, in the judgment of the court, for the impartial trial of the issue.

Inquiry into the constitutional grounds for the exercise of such a power by the United States may begin by taking an analogous case. The United States, by international law and by treaty obligations, owes to foreign governments a duty of protecting their subjects resident within the States. So highly is this duty regarded by the law of nations that breach of it may be casus belli. Within 15 years, to go back no further, the United States has several times been called to account for the killing of foreign subjects by mobs within the States, although the practice of the State Department has been, for prudential reasons, to disclaim any direct responsibility for these outrages.

Can it be doubted that the United States, having this duty of protection, and being answerable to the world for its performance, has power to perform it? There can be but one answer to this question (see Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S., 678, 683). Whatever preconceived notions may have been, whatever the practice of the Government may be, the powers of the United States are necessarily coextensive with its lawful obligations. Where there is a recognized duty there must be governmental power adequate to its discharge. Any other rule would make the Government a name of reproach.

The early theory that the United States has no police power, so called, or power to protect life or punish crimes of violence within the States is already superseded by judicial decision. It is now determined by the highest authority that the United States has such power, when a Federal right or duty is invaded or involved. This principle is neither new nor startling, though modern applications of it have attracted attention. For example, it is now held that the United States, by the hand of its marshal, may lawfully kill one who assaults a Federal judge traveling through a State in the course of his duty, and that the State can not hold the marshal to account for such killing (in re Neagle, 135 U. S., 1); and that the United States may punish, as for murder, one who kills a prisoner in the custody of a Federal officer within a State (Logan v. United States, 144 U. S., 263). The principle is that the persons so assailed are within the peace of the United States; that the United States owes them the duty of protection; and that the power of protection follows upon the duty.

The equality clause of the fourteenth amendment forbids the States to deny to any person within their jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. This clause is judicially held to confer immunity from any discrimination, as a Federal right. The protection which the State extends to one person must be extended to all. It does not forbid discrimination merely in the making of laws, but in the equal protection which the laws are designed to afford. Forbidding the State to deny equal protection is equivalent to requiring the State to provide it. Equal protection is withheld if a State fails to provide it, and the guaranteed immunity is infringed. The constitutional requirement may be violated by acts of omission no less than by acts of commission. The omission of the proper officers of the State to furnish equal protection, in any case, is the omission of the State itself, since the State can act only by its officers. (Tenn. v. Davis, 100 U. S., 257, 266; Strauder v. W. Va., 100 U. S., 303, 306, 310; Va. v. Rives, 100 U. S., 313, 318; Ex parte Va., 100 U. S., 339, 345; United States v. Harris, 106 U. S., 629, 639; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S., 3, 13, 23. Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., 651, 660 et seq.; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S., 356, 373; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S., 683 and (Harlan, J.) 700; In re Coy, 127 U. S., 731; Carter v. Texas, 117 U. S., 442, 447.) It would seem to follow that when a citizen or other person is put to death by a lawless mob, in default of the protection which the State is bound to provide for all alike, there is a denial of equal protection by the State, in the sense of the equality clause, which Congress may prevent or punish by legislation applying to any individuals who participate in or contribute to it, directly or indirectly.

The citizenship clause of the fourteenth amendment, by express declaration, creates and confers citizenship of the United States, as a Federal right, upon all who are born or naturalized within and are subject to its jurisdiction. Formerly, citizenship of the United States within the States was understood to follow only from the State citizenship. The fourteenth amendment directly reversed the conditions. Citizenship of the United States is now the primary right and status, proceeding directly from the Federal Government, while the State citizenship is secondary and derivative from it. This effected a change in the relations between the United States and its citizens which has received little direct judicial consideration. The power to protect the lives of its citizens or subjects is an inherent power of every Government. It was never doubted that the United States has this power, as a power necessarily implied, and may exercise it throughout the world outside the States. It is now judicially established, as above noted, that it may exercise such power within the States, for the vindication of Federal rights or duties. The duty of a Government to protect the lives of its citizens is correlative with the power. The citizen is entitled, as of right, to claim such protection. If the United States can not exercise this power to its full extent within the States, it can be for no other reason than that it is reserved to the States, or to the people. In creating citizenship of the United States by the fourteenth amendment, there is no express reservation of this power. The established rule of constitutional construction now is that the United States has the powers commonly incidental to sovereignty, except the powers expressly denied or reserved to the States or people, and all implied powers properly incidental to the powers granted. The fourteenth amendment expressly authorizes Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation can not, indeed, extend to establishing a complete code of laws. It must be limited to correction of the particular mischief resulting from violation of the amendment. Legislation to protect citizens in their lives against mob violence, in default of such protection by the States, apparently goes no further than to correct the mischief resulting from the default.

It is now held that there is in legal contemplation a peace of the United States existing within and throughout the States. It seems to be judicially regarded as comprehending at least the existence, exercise, and undisturbed enjoyment of the rights derived from or under the United States. (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S., 371, 394; in re Neagle, supra; Logan v. U. S., supra.) If this can be taken as established, it would seem to follow that citizens of the United States, whatever may be said of other persons, are entitled to live in its peace and to have it preserved for the protection of their lives. If the United States can legislate directly for the preservation of its peace within the States, the pending bill appears to be within its powers. If the power and duty to preserve the peace of the United States within the States belong solely to the States, which it may not be wholly safe to concede, and which seems to be inconsistent with principles already established, the failure of the States to preserve it is a breach of duty toward the United States. In this view it may be contended that the United States has power to deal with such a breach as an offense against itself on the part of all individuals who contribute to it, directly or indirectly.

The United States has, as all governments have, a political and legal interest in the lives of its citizens. If it has not full power to protect them in their lives within the States as it has elsewhere, it can be, as already observed, only because that duty rests solely upon the States. If so, it is a duty owed to the United States as well as to individual citizens. It would seem that open and notorious neglect or omission of this duty on the part of a State, by suffering lawless mobs to murder citizens for want of legal protection, may be declared an offense against the United States, and, if so, that the United States may punish all persons who contribute to it.

It may be said that if the United States has power to protect the lives of its citizens within the States it must have power to protect their other personal and property rights, and so to supersede State laws by a system of Federal legislation, which is impossible. This does not follow. There is no doubt that so far as the express provisions of the fourteenth amendment extend Federal legislation for its enforcement may extend, whatever the consequences. For example, if a State should omit to enact any legislation for the protection of a certain class of citizens against crimes of violence, forbidding and punishing such crimes only when committed against the other class or classes, it can hardly be doubted that Congress, under the enforcement clause, may supply the omission by direct legislation, or may perhaps annul the whole system of discriminating laws, leaving the State to provide others which will conform to the requirement of equality. The consequences of the failure of a State to enforce laws made for protection against violence are no less disastrous to the unprotected class than the failure of the State to make any such laws. It is difficult to perceive why the power and the duty of Congress to interfere, under the enforcement clause, are not as clear in the one case as in the other.

Apart from the fourteenth amendment, it may well be that the United States owes its citizens protection in their lives while not owing them a complete system of laws for the protection of all personal and property rights, and that its power is coextensive with its duty, but extends no further.

Without attempting an exhaustive inquiry into this delicate and difficult subject, it can safely be assumed that preconceived opinions are not conclusive of the question. In view of express constitutional provisions, and in the present state of judicial decision, the existence or nonexistence of this power in the Federal Government can be determined only by submitting a statute to the test of judicial examination.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I assume that there is no difference of opinion among men representing the different sections of the country in reference to the fact that the crime of lynching is a crime which nobody can defend, a crime which must be suppressed. The question is how best to proceed to do the thing that ought to be done. Before beginning a discussion of this bill I want to challenge the slanders which have been heaped upon the South by a lot of these hired Negro agitators and white negroettes that have been going over the country falsely representing my people. I received the other day a statement from the Tuskegee Institute. The gentleman who has just taken his seat quoted practically all of his statistics and gave practically all his information from that source. Under the date of December 31, 1921, they sent out broadcast, with release for publication dated January 1, "The lynch record for 1921," from which I quote, "there were 63 persons lynched in 1921. Of those 62 were in the South and one in the North." I do not know how I happened to clip this out, but the Washington Post of July 16, 1921, carried a statement under these headlines, which I quote: "Three Negroes hanged by mob in Duluth; 5,000 seize prisoners at police headquarters; troops ordered out. Attack on young white girl rouses crowd's fury." These Negroes were connected with a circus. They took a white girl into the circus grounds and ravished her. This Duluth, Minn., mob hung them all to a telephone pole in the middle of the city. Three at once in one place. And yet we are told that only one person was lynched in the entire North during all of the year 1921. The gentleman who has just taken his seat told you of a killing in East St. Louis of 100 people at one time.

That is the sort of thing we are afraid of. We people who believe we understand the situation are convinced that you men are fixing to cut the cord that holds in leash the passion of race conflict in the South and bring to the South such tragedies as that of East St. Louis, in which almost as many people were killed in that one city in one riot as are killed in the entire South by mobs in two years.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand it to be the gentleman's position that in order to keep down——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Just for a question.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). The passions of race prejudice it is necessary to give them an occasional outlet of burnings and lynchings?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, I do not quite understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Sit down and I will make you understand it. It is a hard job, but I can do it. Here is what I mean. Listen to me. Look at me and let me talk to you. I mean this: I mean that nobody on this earth can protect the black man who is in danger of mob violence except the people in the community at the very time of the danger. I mean that if the Federal Government interposes its power, assumes responsibility now borne entirely by the people, so that the man on the ground will feel it is not his duty to protect, but that the Federal Government has stepped in and will take care of the situation, then you are likely to turn loose the passions of race conflict in that community.

Let me tell you something. Suppose this other thing happens—and you can do it under this bill—suppose that a black man takes a little white child and drags her off into seclusion where no voice can hear and no hand can help, and rapes that child, and the father of that child and the brothers of the child come up on him and kill him, and the Federal Government takes them away in the face of public sentiment and places them in the Federal penitentiary, and then has a tax of $10,000 levied against the county for the benefit of the rapist's family, a part of which sum might go to buy that family an automobile to ride by the home of the innocent victim, do you think, as a matter of common sense, with such a policy you could long prevent a condition in that country like those which developed in East St. Louis, Omaha, and Chicago?

Mr. MONDELL. What about——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I regret I can not yield further. Gentlemen, I want to discuss this bill somewhat in order, and I would like not to be interrupted. In order to save as much time as possible I had transcribed the quotations which I expected to refer to in the volumes which I have on the table.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to mob violence, to the crimes which provoke mob violence, and to the conditions which permit those crimes to result in mob violence. I am opposed to this bill because it would increase mob violence by encouraging the crimes which are the most provocative of mob violence and which more than all things else combined create the condition out of which mob violence as a punishment for other offenses arises. I am opposed to this bill because the interposition of Federal power would lessen the sense of local responsibility and retard the growth of local purpose to suppress mob violence. I am opposed to this bill because it is unconstitutional and appeals for its support to the very spirit which it denounces—the spirit of disregard for law and for the sacredness of the official oath. This bill can not pass this House unless it is put through by that same spirit which inspires the mob when, backed by the courage of numbers, excused in conscience by the law's delays and alleged miscarriage of justice, they crush through by the sheer weight of numbers the legal barriers which deny the right to proceed in the manner undertaken and do an unlawful thing.

You are asked to do a thing contrary to the supreme law of the land in order to make certain and quick a punishment alleged to be deserved. Gentlemen, that is the identical appeal of the leader of the mob. This bill has incorporated therein provisions which no lawyer in this House or elsewhere can defend and but few, if any, have reputations so poor or so well established that they will hazard them in the attempt. Yet you will be asked to pass the bill. They whisper in your ears

"political expediency" and ask you to yield to it. That is the same whisper which comes to the ear of the sheriff when the mob is battering at the jail door. Wonderful example they ask you to set to the constabulary of this country.

I am opposed to lynching. If I were at home and I heard that an effort was being made to arouse the mob spirit, I would oppose it.

If I had been in Omaha when they were about to mob the mayor because he had stood between the mob and its intended victim, I would have opposed that. To-day the Constitution of the United States stands at the door, guarding the governmental integrity of the States, the plan and the philosophy of our system of government, and the gentleman from Missouri, rope in hand, is appealing to you to help him lynch the Constitution. I am opposed to that. If it were not for the tragic possibilities which are involved and the duty imposed, if I were actuated by political considerations, I would merely register a general protest and hope for favorable action. But, gentlemen, this is not a matter with regard to which either side can afford to play politics.

Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the conflict of individual judgments as to whether this bill is constitutional or unconstitutional, whether it embodies a wise or unwise governmental policy, all who have examined its provisions and have contemplated its direct effect upon the governmental units under our system and the scope of the Federal powers which it as a precedent would establish, if constitutional, must agree that not since the formation of the Federal Government has a more important legislative proposition addressed itself to the consideration of the Congress.

Gentlemen of the House, the importance of this proposed legislation from the standpoint of the consideration which it merits at this time, however controlling that ought to be, is not dependent entirely upon the naked question as to its constitutionality. The effect of this bill, if adopted, even if declared unconstitutional, would be to mark, in so far as the expression of legislative judgment and will is concerned, and in so far as that expression would reflect the public attitude and direct public inclination, incomparably the greatest advance toward the obliteration of the States as independent governmental agencies of the people which has yet been registered by any expression of legislative or public attitude. The Congress has not only the responsibility for legislation, but in the very nature of things, the responsibility, in a large measure, of leadership of public opinion with regard to governmental policy. Whether to be condoned or not, party policy and political expediency are permitted in all Governments controlled by parties to influence much of the mass of current legislation. But when the matter under consideration goes to the fundamentals of government as distinguished from the policy of government, it carries a challenge to the conscience of the legislator, an appeal to his fidelity, to the larger duty to his country, which will not tolerate regard for political expediency.

Mr. Chairman, such a measure is now under consideration. I challenge it because it is without constitutional warrant. I challenge it because it is definitely and directly antagonistic to the philosophy of our system of government, and within the limit of its effectiveness, if it should be held constitutional, would be destructive of that system.

I challenge it because it is contrary to its own declared purpose. If enacted and operative it would not add to the protection of person or the general efficiency of government, or strengthen the relationship between the Federal Government and the States. But, on the contrary, this proposed intervention of the Federal Government directed against local power, supplanting and superseding the sovereignty of the States, would tend to destroy that sense of local responsibility for the protection of person and property and the administration of justice, from which sense of local responsibility alone protection and governmental efficiency can be secured among free peoples.

There is no other way under heaven, known among men, by which it can be done. This bill, as I say, challenges the efficiency of the governments of the States, and here is the difference between this bill and the other bills that we have been enacting here expanding the Federal power: This bill, challenging as it does the relative governmental efficiency of the States and the integrity of purpose of their governmental agencies, placing the Federal Government, as it does, in the attitude of an arbitrary dictator assuming coercive powers over the States, their officers, and their citizens in matters of local police control, would do incomparable injury to the spirit of mutual respect and trustful cooperation between the Federal Government and the States essential to the efficiency of government. As a precedent, this bill, establishing the principles which it embodies and the congressional powers which it assumes to obtain, would strip the States of every element of sovereign power, control, and final responsibility for the personal and property protection of its citizens, and would all but complete the reduction of the States to a condition of governmental vassalage awaiting only the full exercise of the congressional power.

Gentlemen, I do not excuse the sixty-odd lynchings that occurred in the South in a year, but when you consider the millions of black people who live in that country, and when you consider the fact that we do have white men there who are not law-abiding, just as we do have black men there who are not law-abiding, and you measure what occurs there by what occurred in East St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha, it shows that the people in that great section of the country are doing the best they can. [Applause.] I realize that it is a bad situation down there for the black people. No black man or white man who lives in the South now is responsible for that condition. Away back yonder our ancestors, the men from New England, many of them, brought their shiploads of slaves from the jungles of Africa and sold them to my people. It was a tragedy, in so far as the white people were concerned. I do not know how you think about it, but it was not a tragedy in so far as the black man was concerned. Sometimes I think God Almighty had a hand in that, because slavery was the only door that swung open to give the black man a chance to get away from savagery of the jungle. There is not a black man in the gallery up there who does not owe to the institution of slavery his contact with civilization. It was a curse to the white man, but it so happened that under that institution of slavery these poor black people had a chance to come to America, and through the institution of slavery they got a species of coercion that enabled them in a few generations to break away from the habits of indolence that had grown upon them by reason of their centuries and centuries of tropical residence, and eventually it enabled their children to be sent to school under conditions of civilization. But during its continuance the institution of slavery was sapping the vitality of southern civilization. I have repeatedly said that while the Civil War was a terrible price to pay, yet it was not too big a price to pay if that alone could have served to relieve the white people from that terrible institution of slavery which was destroying the civilization of the South.

Now, we had the Negro population left on our hands. They were brought there. They did not come of their own accord, and when they were freed the people of the North, not understanding the situation, just as they do not understand this situation now, under the passions engendered by the war, did that thing which had never been done before since the men of our blood first left northern Europe and started out to build up the civilization of the world. It was the first time in all the centuries when one branch of the white family tried to put the heel of another race upon the neck of men of their own blood. I do not hold any prejudice against you. I realize this was the aftermath of a great war, and what happens in such times must be judged in the light of the passions which war always engenders. And these millions of black people were turned loose as they were—with a responsibility they were not fitted to meet. I do not say this to their discredit, everything considered, or in criticism of them—of course they are more inclined to commit crimes than white men are. It would be the most unreasonable thing not to expect it. Only a short time ago their ancestors roamed the jungles of Africa in absolute savagery. Now we have them here. I do not know what we are going to do about it, gentlemen. You can pass this bill if you want to, but I am giving you the judgment of a man who believes he knows. I am going to put the responsibility on your own consciences. My people get along the best they can with the situation. We are all sick and tired of this lynching and these outrages and with the propaganda of misrepresentation. There are many, many people in the South who are willing to say to the Federal Government, "If you can do it, for God's sake come and do it."

These people say that. We are tired of it. We know it is not right. The conscience of the country is revolting against these conditions, and if we could get a little more help from you people, exerted with the black people, to encourage them to run out the criminal element from among them while we work on the criminal element of the white people, instead of sending these Negro agitators down there to preach social equality among my people, you would aid more than you are aiding now. [Applause.] We might just as well understand ourselves, gentlemen. That day never will come—there is no necessity for anybody mistaking it—that day never will come when the black man and the white man will stand upon a plane of social equality in this country, and that day never will come in any section of the United States when you will put a black man in office above the white man. [Applause.] That never will happen. It never can happen on the face of God Almighty's earth. It has not happened in 4,000 years and never will. Oh, you can elect one here and there in communities where you have them in control. You can give him a little recognition to keep the boys lined up, but he is under white control, and you never will surrender the control of your government in any community to the black race. It can not happen.

Now, I will be very candid with you gentlemen about the situation in the South. The big difficulty is when the crime of rape is committed against a white woman. Millions of these people live there among us. We all live together. We understand one another. We have established a basis on which we can get along pretty well. We have our difficulties, of course. It is an unnatural situation. The big thing we dread, the thing we are working against, law-abiding white people and law-abiding black people, is what happened in East St. Louis. These isolated cases of mob violence are bad. But if we can keep them isolated we can hope to bring them under control. In the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts a few weeks ago, up there at Barnstable I believe it was, three West Indian Negroes took a white girl from her escort and raped her. A mob was formed, bent on lynching them. It took the governor of the State three days to dispel the mob spirit. Just one thing prevented that from being a lynching and that is that they did not have a great sea of these people about them. That is what prevented it.

It is pretty easy to talk about it, gentlemen. Of course, the number of black men who commit these crimes is very small, but you do not know where the beast is among them. Somewhere in that black mass of people is the man who would outrage your wife or your child, and every man who lives out in the country knows it.

They say that lynching is an American institution. Well, it is, in a degree. Except in a narrow strip of country along the eastern seaboard home-made law preceded legislature-made law all the way to the Pacific coast. In the western part of my State it was the rugged pioneer who established home-made law. There never was much trouble or danger from that source. It is the lawless element who are giving us so much trouble, sometimes killing these black people when they do not commit these terrible crimes. That very fact, however, more than all else is developing in the South the purpose to suppress mob violence. The purpose is there, and we will do it if you will give us a chance. We do not need any guardianship by the Federal Government. In the western part of my State it was the rugged old pioneer, who could ride as hard and shoot as straight as the bad man could, who drove the desperado beyond the Rio Grande and established respect for law and made human life possible and safe in that country.

And it is a rather interesting thing, too, that as society has established legislatures and courts men in my part of the country have never yielded to the courts established by legislatures or to laws established by legislatures the protection of their women. There is just one thing they will not litigate. Nowhere under God Almighty's sky will they yet litigate the issue of a foul wrong committed against their women. [Applause.] They have not yielded that yet. You see, they had that jurisdiction first. They delegated authority to the courts after the courts got there, but they were there first. That will change as pioneer influences and ideals give way. It is changing now. There is another thing that makes the situation more difficult in the South. I do not know why, but somewhere in the great purpose of God Almighty He has determined to preserve, for a while yet, at least, these lines of racial cleavage that He has drawn among the races of men.

I do not know why, and you do not, either, but there is nobody up there in Yankeedom or down in my country that can obliterate those lines of racial distinction. God Almighty drew them in the councils of His infinite wisdom, and put the instinct of racial preservation there to protect them. You ask me what we will do to protect it. We will do whatever is necessary, that is all. Men who do not live in the presence of the danger do not hear the call. [Applause.] Nature does not waste her energies. When men respond to that call, they respond to a law that is higher than the law of self-preservation. It is the call to the preservation of the race. When men answer to that call, you can not reason with them. That law knows no reason. You can not appeal to their sense of justice. It knows no sense of justice. It is a blind, unyielding, uncompromising, all-sacrificing purpose of the dominant race to control the situation. When that call comes every man who is not a racial degenerate has to answer it. [Applause.] It is the call of the blood. Men do not count the cost under those circumstances when once the race passion is aroused. We will have to work at this thing from every angle. The face of society of his own race must be set against the black criminal, and the white hoodlum must be suppressed. But, above all, while we are working out these problems we must hold in leash the brutal passion of race conflict which inspires the mobs in the North. When a white woman is raped by a black man the call to the man is from his two strongest, most primitive instincts. No doubt when men lived in caves the strongest instinct of the man was to protect his woman. The next strongest instinct is to protect the blood. When the call comes from the woman, crying out from the depths of her outraged chastity, there comes to the man a call which reaches back to the days when he was a savage in the cave, and he goes. When that call comes from the woman who has been raped by a man of alien blood, woman, who in every age of the world has been the faithful guardian of the purity of the race—when that call comes it is the call of his woman and the call of his blood, and he goes. It is not an easy situation to deal with. [Applause.] He goes not alone. His neighbors, whose women live under the same danger, go with him. The impulse is to kill, to kill as a wild beast would be killed.

Gentlemen, do not misunderstand me or misquote me. I understand we have to deal with this situation. One must yield to the law. But no attempt at Federal coercion can help. Let nobody misunderstand what it means to say in the presence of the victim, "Let the law take its course," when there comes down from the mountain tops of civilization and up from the deepest caverns of man's nature the mightiest force that ever beats against the battlement of self-restraint. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, this bill is a remarkable piece of legislation. I see gentlemen before me who are going to say that they have defended the constitutionality of this bill, but they will be joking, because it can not be done. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, to put upon the statute book a measure of this sort which could serve no other purpose than to give encouragement to the ignorant and vicious, and to stimulate crimes which arouse prejudice against a minority race, which this legislation, if constitutional, could not protect, would be a crime against those people that can not be excused. Nobody can protect them against the mob except the white people with whom they live. What will the criminal read in this bill? Take the hearings on this bill and from one end to the other there is not one word of condemnation. What will they read in this bill as they gather in their dives? Do not misunderstand me. I say that there are relatively only a few such among the great body of black people of my country. Where you are making the mistake and where you continue to make the mistake is in creating the impression that you propose to defend them. I know that we have got to stop it, but I am not losing so much sleep over the bunch that commits the crime as over the ones that have done nothing, but you gentlemen propose in this bill to lose no sleep over the innocent ones and try to protect the ones that have committed the crime.

Let me read you the definition. Let me show you what they are after. Are they after the East St. Louis bunch? Let us see. Section 1 reads:

> That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

What will the criminal read in that bill? Will he read in it a condemnation from the great Federal Government? No. But what will he read? He will read, and it is a fair conclusion, that Uncle Sam says that if I do this thing and anybody in this community gets after me and strings me up, Uncle Sam will send them to the penitentiary and make the folks pay a $10,000 fine.

Gentlemen, I should apologize to the House for not having proceeded at once to the discussion of the constitutional questions involved, but we desire it to be clearly understood in the beginning that while this bill is challenged because it is without constitutional warrant, it is further challenged because in its violation it extends beyond the letter of the Constitution and attacks the fundamental principles and philosophy of government from which our Constitution draws its vitality. Not only that, but it is in disregard of the lesson taught by the actual experience of men in the realm of government.

I lay down this proposition: If this bill is sound in the governmental policy which it undertakes to embody, then our whole plan of government, which the judgment of men everywhere accords first place among the masterpieces of the world's constructive statesmanship, is fundamentally unsound. I challenge anybody to refute that statement.

The more you study this bill and contemplate the consequences of congressional indorsement upon the Nation's governmental policy, regardless of the question of constitutionality, the more importance will your judgment attach to the matter. Let no man imagine that in the present state of public opinion, the present direction in which it is pressing, we will be able to turn back upon the course along which this bill gives us direction, if we add to the pressure of public attitude the weight of congressional approval to this sort of measure. There is no use in fooling ourselves about it, either. In the very nature of things Congress is not only charged with the responsibility of legislation but it is charged with the responsibility of leading public opinion with regard to sound governmental policy.

It is not proposed by this bill to negative discriminatory State action; it is not proposed merely to oust the States from final police control and responsibility within their respective borders, but that the Federal Government shall lay its hands in coercive power upon the governmental machinery of the States themselves, as such, and upon their officers as officers of the States, and upon their citizens as citizens of the States, and in matters clearly within the realm of police control undertake to compel them by force of the Federal Government to carry out the edict of the Congress with regard to local police control. I say that when you pass this sort of bill you take from the States such inherent elements of sovereignty, of dignity of final governmental responsibility, as to make it absurd to talk about the State being a sovereign unit of the Government. How can a State be a sovereign unit of government when you hold over it the uplifted lash of the Federal Congress, telling its officers and people what they must do, and, if they fail, sending them to the penitentiary? What would be left? Put this on the statute books, if you please. You are welcome to all of the political benefits you will get out of it. You will find that there is somebody else to whom you have to answer in this country besides this little handful of agitators, who have scared you to death. If the Federal Government can punish each of five individuals who constitute a mob or riotous assemblage, as is provided in this bill, it can inflict punishment if the offense were committed by one individual acting alone. If the Federal Government can punish for murder committed within a State, as is proposed by this bill, it can punish for all offenses committed against a person, from murder to simple assault. Is not that a sound proposition? If the Federal Government can punish for murder, for a physical offense, it can punish for every offense committed against property within a State. That is the power that they are claiming for the Federal Government, these gentlemen who are supporting this bill. When they say that the Federal Government has not that power they admit that the Federal Government has not the power to enact this bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman is familiar with the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary at the time that the bill was before that committee, he will recall that the question was asked Col. Goff, the Assistant Attorney General, whether if this bill were constitutional and the Federal Government had control of individual action, which heretofore had always been in the forum of the States, it would be possible for the Federal Government to punish embezzlement and larceny and assault and battery, and that Col. Goff replied that it would.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to it. That is absolutely the fact. If this bill is sound as a legislative premise, that conclusion is sound. You can not escape it; but his conclusion does not support the premise; it destroys it. Yet you are asked to pass this bill. I do not want to be offensive, but I say to you that you can not pass this bill unless you pass it under the influence of the same spirit which this bill denounces, viz, the mob spirit. You say that the folks down in the South are not doing this thing fast enough and quick enough, and the folks in the South say the officers are not doing this thing fast enough and quick enough, and you both get ropes and they go after a nigger and you go after the Constitution. [Laughter and applause.]

If it is lawful for the Federal Government to levy a penalty against a county as provided in this bill, merely because mob violence may have occurred in that county resulting in death, or that the person afterwards killed may have been transported across the county, it can levy a penalty against each county for every offense committed within it by any individual citizen against the person or the property of any other individual citizen whether the county officer knew a thing about it or not. Here is what these modern solons are claiming was written into the Constitution by the fourteenth amendment: That the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution gave to the Federal Government the power to levy a penalty against every county for every offense. They must do that or they can not support that clause of this bill. Now, you mark it, when they get up here——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course the gentleman would limit that to matters relating to extending the denial of the equal protection laws if——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Oh, if Congress can do what is tried to be done in the second section of this bill, trying to expand the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution by legislative enactment so that they will have a basis upon which to rest the legislative enactment——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is by definition.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; by definition. The States ceded to the Congress a definite power over them. Now, the Congress comes in, the recipient of the power, and tries by definition to spread out its power so as to do what the Constitution will not let it. If that is the best that they can do, then it is pretty poor. There is not a thing in the fourteenth amendment about prohibiting mob violence, nothing about five persons, nothing about physical violence, nothing about property. The provisions are general.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman concede that there is power in the Congress to pass affirmative legislation for the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Or is it merely a negative passive assertion of right?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; Congress has the power——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am speaking now specifically in reference to the equal protection laws.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will discuss that in a few minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The fourteenth amendment was a prohibition against a State's denial, while this bill is predicated not upon the denial by the State but upon the action of five individuals. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not only is that true, but Congress in this particular instance is undertaking to enact a municipal code to define offenses and provide for their punishment, which the Supreme Court has said Congress can not do.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I prefer not to yield because I have in mind to discuss these matters in some order.

If this bill is constitutional Congress can provide the conditions under which the governors of the several States will be required to call out the militia of the State to defend the person or the property of the citizens of the State, and could provide for the trial and punishment of the governor, through criminal proceedings in the Federal court, and could send the governor of a State to the Federal penitentiary for a violation of the legislative will and edict of Congress with regard to the protection of the persons or property of his own people.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I should prefer very much not to do so.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to interpose—

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. In relation to the fact this bill itself as written provides for that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I was just going to call the attention of the House to that. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

This is the important thing about this bill. It does not propose in terms or principle merely an extension of Federal activity through Federal machinery acting in harmony with, in respectful attitude toward, and in governmental cooperation with the States. It is a new sort of thing. This bill proposes a direct and humiliating governmental vassalage of the States, and you can not make anything else out of it. Do you tell me any good will come? Never before in the history of this Government, in so far as I know, has any group of lawyers in Congress or out of it claimed any such power or favored its exercise. What sort of a governmental mess will we have in this country if we embark upon this sort of a legislative policy?

If we did not have a decision from the Supreme Court, and, by the way, you are the judges of your constitutional powers; the Supreme Court decisions, when clear and established, mark out the boundary line of congressional action, but it does not relieve the conscience of the Congressman. You must pass upon your constitutional power, and I challenge you to-day under your official oaths. You sit here as the highest court in the land and determine the issues of your constitutional powers. I challenge the right of any man to vote for this bill if he believes it to be unconstitutional. If there was not a single decision from the Supreme Court, there is not a man sitting here—let us be honest about it, man to man—who will assert that in any time of this country's history there ever was a moment when one single State would have yielded to the Federal Government such power as they assert in this bill rests in the Federal Government. There is not one single thing in the political history of this country, nothing in its philosophy of government, and not one word in the contemporaneous discussion of the fourteenth amendment, to justify such a conclusion.

I make this statement, too, gentlemen: I have as much respect for the Supreme Court as anybody, but if the Supreme Court had decided that, your own conscience and common sense would not permit you to indorse the decision. You are guardians of the Constitution and of the integrity of the States. The Supreme Court is not the keeper of the congressional conscience.

You sit to-day under your high privileges as Members of the House of Representatives of the United States. No man or tribunal can coerce you. You face your God and your conscience, the States and the Nation, and render your judgment as honest men. That is your business. You know, men, that never was there a minute in the history of this country when any such power would have been conferred upon the Federal Government as is claimed here.

The first of the great decisions construing the fourteenth amendment was the decision rendered in the famous Slaughterhouse case, reported in Sixteenth Wallace, and decided in 1872. I quote:

* * * When the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both of these Governments to the people; the argument—illustrating what could be done under such a power, as I have undertaken to illustrate what could be done under this bill—has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the soundness of that conclusion. The people never would have ratified a constitutional amendment conferring any such power as this bill seeks to have the Federal Government exercise. Gentlemen, I submit to your judgment, what sort of a legislative proposition could go forth more completely—to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character?

That is persuasive? No. The court said it had a force that was irresistible—in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

This judge wrote this opinion within three years after Mr. Thad. Stevens put the fourteenth amendment through this House. He said he was convinced no such result was intended by Congress nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them. This court sustains what I said a while ago, and he was speaking at that time——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has used one hour.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield myself 30 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 30 minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the soundness of the conclusion. The people would never have ratified a constitutional amendment conferring such power as this bill seeks to confer upon the Federal Congress.

Gentlemen, I shall not be able to follow in the order I had intended the discussion of the constitutional questions involved, but I shall be able to cover it sufficiently to show what the judgments of the courts are. Here is what this judge said in concluding his opinion:

But, however pervading this sentiment and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system.

He says, "We do not see in the fourteenth amendment any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system." What would he have said if he had read this bill? What feature of the general system will be left if you enact this bill, if you establish as a principle of government in this country that the Federal Government shall stand with the uplifted lash of congressional enactment over every officer of the State? What have you left under your system? You are welcome, gentlemen, to all the glory that you will get out of putting this sort of thing on the statute books of the conntry. It will be a fine thing for your children to read in the days that are to come that "My daddy on this bill answered 'aye' on the vote when it came." But this is not merely the enactment of a law. This is dynamiting the governmental structure. [Applause.] That is what it is, and if you folks show the people that this is the thing to do they will bring in some more dynamite. [Applause.]

No, sir; you can not turn back on this course when you add to the public inclination this sanction of the Congress, sitting in solemn judgment under its congressional powers. You are welcome to do it, but I am going to put the responsibility where it belongs. In the early seventies the carpetbagger was in his glory; but still he had some sense left. I do not say you folks were alone to blame. We were all to blame for the situation that existed. But they had some excuse in that day for going crazy. You have not got any now. [Applause.] I read further from the slaughterhouse case:

Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the State, and to confer additional power on that of the Nation.

You will notice he said, "our statesmen." I do not say "our Congressmen," but there is no reflection meant. I hope you will all be statesmen this time. You can be Congressmen next time. And remember that this is the Supreme Court that is speaking about this thing, not some fellow reading a lot of stuff from Tuskegee. [Laughter.]

But no power—

Says the court—to fetter and degrade the State government by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character.

Among all the powers exercised by the States, none is more general—ordinary—or fundamental than the police power. This bill undertakes to do the identical thing which the Supreme Court, in its first pronouncement, said can not be done, and was not intended to be done, by those who proposed and by those who ratified the fourteenth amendment.

They thought it was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations upon our States, and to confer additional power on that of the Nation. Gentlemen, draw the picture in your mind of a United States marshal putting shackles on the arms of the governor and pulling him out of the mansion of the people of the State and dragging him off to a Federal tribunal, to answer for something that he failed to do with reference to the protection of people who elected him to office! You can not do it. You can not get any Supreme Court, you can not get a district court, to hold this thing constitutional. "But no power," says the court, "to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character."

I am quoting from the court, remember. I am quoting from the court, although it is making my argument for me. The police power is the most ordinary power that a State exercises. This bill undertakes to do the identical thing which the Supreme Court says can not be done, a thing which was not intended to be done by those who proposed and ratified the amendment. Now, here is the best authority on earth as to what was intended. And he was a man who did not love my people. I am not fond of him. It is Mr. Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania. There is no better authority on this earth as to what they were trying to do than Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania.

He was the acknowledged leader in the passage of the resolution through the House submitting the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. In his discussion of the first section of that amendment he disclosed the object had in mind, namely, the conference of power upon the Federal Government to negative discriminatory legislation on the part of the State against people of color. A number of States had enacted such legislation as a part of the governmental feud growing out of the period of reconstruction. Such legislation was not confined, however, to the South. I am advised that even the State of Ohio had a "black code." I shall quote from Mr. Stevens, the best authority, as to the cause which prompted the submission of and the object sought to be attained by the adoption of the first section of the fourteenth amendment. Mr. Stevens, in his discussion, had this to say with reference to the first section, the one containing the "equal protection" clause:

* * * the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the place from which he takes that quotation, the page of the Congressional Globe, or whatever it is?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; I believe I can. If I can not, I will furnish it to the gentleman later.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman said that he would not find it possible in his statement before the House to cite all his authorities.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman put his citations in the RECORD as a part of his speech?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. In the quotation from Mr. Stevens did I understand the gentleman to read his statement to the effect that Congress could correct State legislation that denied equal protection of the law?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; he stated that Congress had the power to deny the States the power to legislate in discrimination.

Mr. REAVIS. Of course, legislation denying the equal protection of the law would be held unconstitutional without congressional action?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The courts would take care of that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But gentleman are proposing under that section of the fourteenth amendment not the exercise of the power to negative discriminatory acts on the part of the State, but to enact a part of a municipal code, for Congress to do it, to punish one citizen of a State, under a law enacted by the Congress, for a crime committed against another citizen of the same State. That is the vice of this proposed legislation. Such a thing as is proposed by this bill clearly was not had in contemplation when the amendment was submitted or when it was ratified, even in those times when the shadows of a great conflict still hung over the land and prejudice and passion too often wrought confusion in the judgment of our statesmen.

The fourteenth amendment did not undertake to create any additional guaranties as among the citizens of the State.

THE CRUIKSHANK CASE.

The next of the leading cases bearing upon the power of the Federal Government to punish individuals for wrongs committed against other individuals, as is proposed in this bill, is United States v. Cruikshank et al., decided in 1875.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman insert his citations in his printed speech?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. The Cruikshank case, decided in 1875, is found in Ninety-second United States, 542.

This case arose under the sixth section of the act of May 31, 1870, known as the enforcement act, which, in part, is as follows:

If two or more persons shall band or conspire together, * * * with intent to violate any of the provisions of this act * * * or intimidate any citizen with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States * * * shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court. * * *

This, in effect, is the law to-day.

Cruikshank and associates were charged in the District Court of Louisiana with engaging in a conspiracy to violate and for violating this section, and were convicted. Upon review by the Supreme Court it was held that the fourteenth amendment does not undertake to create any additional guaranty as among the citizens of the States.

From this judgment of conviction the Supreme Court ordered the defendants discharged, the court holding—I quote briefly:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, * * * add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. * * * Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there—

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] to the contrary notwithstanding.

I am afraid I am tiring the House, but this is a tremendously important matter. The next decision to which I desire to direct your attention is the case of the United States v. Harris (106 U. S., p. 629), and I call special attention to this case because it was a lynching case. In this particular case a mob took the prisoner away from the deputy sheriff. It is on all fours, as we would say if we were discussing this matter before a court.

Harris and 19 others were indicted for taking from the custody of a deputy sheriff a number of persons. It was charged that the prisoners had—

"been duly arrested * * * were then and there in the custody of a deputy sheriff of said county * * * were entitled to due and equal protection of the laws thereof * * * that the said R. G. Harris and 19 others, naming them, with certain other persons * * * did then and there * * * unlawfully conspire together" and take these prisoners from the custody of the officers, "beating, bruising, wounding, and otherwise ill treating them, * * * contrary to the form of the statute,"—

And so forth, and charging conspiracy to hinder the deputy sheriff from safely keeping the prisoners. The same sort of indictment as would be drawn for an offense committed under this bill. This indictment was drawn under section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, of the act of 1871, which is very similar to the section under which the Cruikshank indictment was had, and is identical in legislative import with provisions in the bill under consideration.

It will be observed upon an examination of this indictment that in effect it charged the same offense as is defined in the last clause of section 3 of the bill under consideration, which undertakes to subject to Federal jurisdiction any citizen of a State guilty of taking a defendant from the custody of a State or municipal officer and inflicting death upon such person as a punishment for his crime.

Section 4 of the bill under consideration is identical in principle with the section under which this indictment was had. The opinion was rendered by Mr. Justice Woods, who, after disposing of the contentions of the Government with reference to the constitutionality of the action under other provisions of the Constitution, said:

It is, however, strenuously insisted that the legislation under consideration finds its warrant in the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment. The first section declares * * * nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

After quoting the authorities in the Slaughterhouse cases, the Cruikshank case, Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, the court says:

These authorities show conclusively that the legislation under consideration finds no warrant for its enactment in the fourteenth amendment. * * * In the indictment in this case, for instance, which would be a good indictment under the law if the law itself were valid, there is no intimation that the State of Tennessee has passed any law or done any act forbidden by the fourteenth amendment. On the contrary, the gravamen of the charge against the accused is that they conspired to deprive certain citizens of the United States and of the State of Tennessee of the equal protection accorded them by the laws of Tennessee.

A remarkable thing about this bill is that it comes in here with the condemnation of the Supreme Court, in the clearest language, resting upon every provision, except possibly a part of one section. I say this contains as remarkable a legislative proposition as the history of Congress will show.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to get clearly the gentleman's view of the constitutional provision. I have hesitated to interrupt him because he is making an interesting discussion. Is it the gentleman's view that the provisions of the Constitution which he is discussing and on which he says this is to be based—that these provisions are self-executing and can only be invoked for the purpose of holding the law of the State unconstitutional?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not say that they are entirely self-executing, because section 5 gives Congress the power to enact legislation, but only a certain sort of legislation.

I want to confine myself to the section of the bill under consideration, but the Supreme Court says that Congress can not enact such legislation as Harris was prosecuted under and which provided that if citizens acting in conspiracy attempted to deprive a person of any right under the Constitution they should be subject to punishment by the Federal Government.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I want to know—is the gentleman of the opinion that Congress does have the right by legislative action to deal with any State governmental agency when that agency does deprive an officer——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think so; but if the gentleman will excuse me, I do not want to go into that now. I concede that, but the point I am trying to make is that Congress does not have the power to do what the committee has asked the Congress to do. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. The only thing Congress has the power to legislate on is not the individual but where the individual acts as the representative of the State and therefore binds the State. His act is the act of the State.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; when his act is the act of the State. I am going to contest the constitutionality of the entire provision in this bill undertaking to punish the officer.

Concluding, the court says:

It was never supposed that the section under consideration conferred on Congress the power to enact a law which would punish a private citizen for an invasion of the rights of his fellow citizen conferred by the State of which they were both residents on all its citizens alike. We have, therefore, been unable to find any constitutional authority for the enactment of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes. The decisions of this court above referred to leave no constitutional ground for the act to stand on.

That decision has never been overruled. In the light of that decision the main provisions of this bill stand forth not only in contempt of our plan of government, but in contempt of the clearest enunciation by the Supreme Court, where law and facts conspired to make the situation identical with that which would arise under prosecution under this bill if enacted.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.

Among the leading cases construing congressional power under the fourteenth amendment are the Civil Rights Cases (109 U. S., 3). Speaking of the prohibitions contained in the first section of the fourteenth amendment, the court says (p. 11):

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the law. * * * To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it.

That is what the Supreme Court says about it.

And again the court says (p. 13):

* * * It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law—

There is a vice in what is attempted here. The Supreme Court says that it is absurd to hold that because the States are prohibited from denying due process of law that Congress can enact statutes under which the Congress would undertake to provide due process of law. Does the gentleman get that distinction?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understand perfectly when the gentleman is talking about the individual, but——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me get through with talking about the individual.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But the gentleman has not quoted any case yet which deals with an officer.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course I have not, but the gentleman must give me a little time in which to do that. Let me repeat again what the court says:

It is absurd to affirm that because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the States without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that because the denial by a State to any persons of equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection.

The court says that sort of thing is absurd—the thing now attempted to be done by this bill. I do not say that it is absurd, because I have too much respect for you gentlemen, but the Supreme Court evidently did not feel that way. Then the court, as though in criticism of this pending proposition, says with reference to the matter then before it, which was the constitutionality of an act granting all citizens equal rights in hotels, inns, and so forth, without regard to color—

This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national legislation.

That is what they assume here. Why, if it belongs to the domain of national legislation to protect against mob violence, then it is within the domain of national legislation to protect against every sort of physical violence. You can not find one single word in the fourteenth amendment that draws the distinction. If it is within the domain of national legislation to protect persons, then it is within the domain of national legislation to protect property. What have you left then in the States? Nothing. This bill strikes at the very heart of State sovereignty and the sense of local responsibility. When you destroy these, what sort of protection have the people who live in a community?

Mr. Chairman, I am just as much interested in the protection of the black men of my country against mob violence as any man in this House, I do not care where he lives. I know that the best thing for them and for the white people down there is for them to have laid on their conscience the sense of responsibility for local conditions. Let the newspapers work and the people work until they build a sentiment there that will defend all the people.

I know that nobody can defend them in the presence of a mob, except the people upon whose conscience there rests responsibility of enforcing the law. You must have a strong and vigorous State, and the people must depend upon the State and depend upon themselves if you are going to get anybody there quick enough to get the man loose who has a rope around his neck. The other fellows will get down there the day after tomorrow, and that will be just two days too late. I know you gentlemen think you know a lot more about this than we who live in this country; I know that you believe that you have a superior conscience—no; I shall not say that, because I know you do not think that. I know that you know that you do not know much about this question. You had better let us alone who live there. We have a pretty hard time of it now. You captured these black people in Africa and sold them to us. We violated God's great law announced at the gate of the Garden of Eden and we are paying the penalty, and you are going to pay a penalty also before we are through. You will have to pay your part of this yet. You got the money for them and then set them free. They are drifting in your direction and you are going to understand this question better some day. Then you will say, "Well, I swear, I voted for that Dyer bill," or perhaps your little child will ask, "Papa, did you vote for the Dyer bill?" and you will answer, "No; I do not reckon I did. I did not look at the RECORD the next day, and the Clerk is always making mistakes." [Laughter.]

But, continuing with an examination of the authorities.

THE CASE OF JAMES V. BOWMAN.

In the case of James v. Bowman, 190 U. S., 127, opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer, the authorities which I have quoted from were reviewed, approved, and it was again declared that Congress possesses no power under either the thirteenth, the fourteenth, or fifteenth amendments to enact such legislation as is here proposed for the protection of one citizen of a State against wrongs committed against his person or property by another.

Time will not permit an analytical discussion of the decisions in point. They are so definite and clear, however, that would seem unnecessary. Nor will Members of the House have an opportunity to examine them all before the vote shall have been reached, but if you will examine only this one decision, James against Bowman, there will be made manifest a lack of constitutional warrant for this bill, considered as a whole, pitiable in the extreme, and the lack of any basis upon which the belief that it exists, in good faith, can be claimed. I do not mean to be discourteous or offensive by that statement; but, gentlemen, this is a most remarkable procedure. A bill is brought into this House and you are asked to enact it into law, with the condemnation of the Supreme Court resting in the clearest language upon practically every one of its provisions.

THE RIGGINS CASE.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the House to one more determination arising under a state of facts most favorable to the theory of the proponents of this legislation. In 1904 Riggins was indicted with a number of coconspirators, including one Powell, under sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes, for taking one Maples from the custody of the sheriff and a detachment of National Guard troops at Huntsville, Ala., and hanging him.

The six counts of the indictment covered every possible phase of the Government's case, charging the act to have been done because Maples was a Negro; that it was done in order to deprive him of his rights to protection, to an orderly trial, and so forth. The circuit court—opinion by Jones, district judge—held to the theory advanced by those who are supporting this bill and denied the application of the defendant for discharge on habeas corpus, made on the ground that the charge under which he was held constituted no offense against the laws of the United States. The opinion of the circuit court is very elaborate, covering 18 pages of the Federal Reporter. In view of the fact that the reasoning of the expounders of the Constitution who appeared before the Judiciary Committee to throw the light of their illuminating judgment upon that ancient document followed every turn and twist of the reasoning of the circuit court in this—the Riggins—case, and that this same circuit court, the same Judge Jones presiding, later in the Powell case, One hundred and fifty-first Federal Reporter, page 648, Powell having been jointly indicted with Riggins and procured a severance, reversed its holding heretofore made in the Riggins case, I shall quote from the Riggins opinion. Those of you who have examined the constitutional arguments—I mean the arguments with reference to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation—will be struck with the remarkable similarity. The court says:

> When a private individual takes a person charged with crime from the custody of the State authorities to prevent the State from affording him due process of law and puts him to death to punish the crime and to prevent the enjoyment of such right, it is violent usurpation and exercise, in the particular case, of the very function which the Constitution of the United States itself, under this clause, directs the State to perform in the interest of the citizen. (Page 409, 134 Fed. Rep.)
> A State officer in attempting to afford due process in a particular case is discharging a duty imposed upon him as the representative of the State by the Constitution of the United States for the benefit of its citizens. The prisoner also, while confined and being protected against lawless violence, that he may have a trial according to the law of the land, is in the exercise or enjoyment of a right given him by the Constitution. Congress may protect the right by protecting the performance of the duty, and the rights which flow from it, by declaring the violations of State laws on the subject constitute offenses against the United States. (Page 411.)

> The constitutional right of the citizen can not bear fruit or ripen into the enjoyment of due process at the hands of the State if lawless outsiders prevent State officers from performing their duty concerning it. The right, privilege, or immunity of a citizen of the United States under this clause, which is to have his State give him the benefit of due process of law, therefore necessarily carries with it and includes in it the right, privilege, or immunity to enjoy freedom, exemption from lawless assault, which supervenes between the State and the performance of its duty, and by such violent interference prevents the citizen having, when the State is endeavoring to afford it, due process at the hands of the State. (Page 413.)

Continuing the court says:

> The court does not doubt that Congress has power to punish the acts charged in the indictment—that is, the act of taking a person from the custody of an officer and lynching him—and that sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes apply to them and are "appropriate" legislation to that end. The result is that the writ must be discharged and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the marshal. (Page 423.)

Not only did the argument before the Judiciary Committee follow the reasoning in this case, but this bill clearly rests upon that reasoning. There is just one difficulty. The court which rendered this opinion later in a companion case, the opinion by the same judge, reversed itself and in that reversal was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. From this decision of the circuit court, the Riggins case went to the Supreme Court. While application for discharge on habeas corpus was pending in the Supreme Court, the Hodges case, 203 U. S. 1, which came up from the State of Arkansas, was decided by that court. In that opinion the Supreme Court adhered to the former holdings in the Hodges and other cases and against the conclusions reached by the circuit court in the Riggins case. In the most comprehensive language it redeclared that no power resides in the Federal Government to punish one citizen of a State for acts of violence committed against another. Shortly after the Hodges case was decided by the Supreme Court the case of Powell, who had been indicted jointly with Riggins, came before the circuit court, which had decided the Riggins case, by the same process and under identically the same circumstances of fact and of law as the Riggins case had come. Judge Jones in this case also rendered the opinion for the court, accepting the decision by the Supreme Court in the Hodges case as a mandate to him not to follow his former decision in the companion Riggins case, and reversed his position taken in the Riggins case and ordered the indictment against Powell quashed and the defendant discharged.

But the matter did not stop there. From this decision in the Powell case, the Government appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, with the issue squarely before it, upon the authority of the Hodges case, affirmed the decision of the circuit court, quashing the indictment and discharging the defendant Powell. (212 U. S., 564.)

Thus the Supreme Court of the United States again, with only the one issue pending, refused to accept the theory here advanced that the taking of a prisoner from the custody of the State and putting him to death gives to the Federal Government jurisdiction under the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I desire next to direct attention to Section V of this act, under which it is sought to impose penalties upon counties in which lynchings occur, and also upon those counties through which the intended victim may be transported prior to execution, and so forth.

Of course, the Federal Government has no power to levy a tax upon a State or upon any of its subdivisions. The power to tax is the power to destroy. The nonexistence of such a Federal power is apparent from an examination of the Constitution, but in view of the remarkable position taken here with regard to the Federal powers over the States, we are fortunate that the matter has been too often decided to be open to question now.

But aside from the matter of taxation, that section, in short, is an arrogant, impudent assumption of a nonexistent police power over the States. It is true that a few of the State governments where general police power resides, of course, in the extreme exercise of that power have enacted such legislation, but it is doubtful if a group of American lawyers, in Congress or out of it, ever before claimed such a power for the Federal Government or indicated a willingness to have it exercise such a power even if it possessed it. This identical point has often been decided by the highest courts of the land. I quote only from Cooley on constitutional limitations:

> In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress. Neither can the National Government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States. All that the Federal authority can do is to see that the States do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the Nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution (p. 831).

But Congress can not enact a code or "assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States" as is attempted in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen of the House desire to pursue the inquiry further, I beg to suggest an examination of City of Chicago against Cement Co., reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth Illinois, 372. In that case the nature of the power, which, of course, is a police power, and the origin of its exercise is discussed. It comes to us from the English system under which each member of the "hundred" was held responsible for the peace, good order, and security within the community.

DUTIES OF OFFICERS OF THE STATES AS PRESCRIBED FOR IN THE BILL.

There remains to be considered the provisions of the bill—section 3—prescribing the duties of the officers of the State. Its directions to State officers with reference to the detection and punishment of those who have been engaged in mob or riotous acts and the penalties provided for noncompliance with the congressional mandate are not even made dependent upon whether there has, in fact, been a failure of "equal protection." It seeks to prescribe by a Federal code and compel by Federal prosecution observance by policemen, sheriffs, prosecuting attorneys, judges, and governors of a policy and a standard of official efficiency in a given circumstance which is a proper standard, but one which only the State can prescribe. It is not the Federal Government's business to give direction to State officers with reference to detection and punishment for crimes which have already been committed by one citizen of a State against other citizens of the State. There is nothing in the Constitution which brings this character of offenses—mob violence—committed within a State against the person within the direct or indirect jurisdiction of the Federal Government as distinguished from the whole body of crimes denounced by State laws. If the Federal Government has this power when one man has been killed by five, it has a power which covers the whole field of police control and extends to the control of the State and municipal police personnel in the discharge of all their police duties. Not only does this section carry the assumption that Congress has jurisdiction over the subject matter, the legislative power to enact a criminal code governing the general discharge of police duties by State officers, but that it has the power of general administrative control over the law-enforcing machinery of the States as such. The authorities already quoted show the nonexistence of such a Federal power.

These matters have been passed upon and settled. There has not been delegated to the Federal Government the power to do any such thing. Besides, what brand of statesmanship would involve us in such a governmental mess as would result from its attempted exercise?

Gentlemen, you are welcome to all the credit reflected by these propositions.

The first part of section 3 is as follows:

That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to prevent such person from being so put to death * * * shall be punished—

And so forth.

There are two decisions by the Supreme Court upon which proponents largely rely for support of this provision, Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.) and Home Telephone Co. against Los Angeles (227 U. S.). Between these decisions lie Barney against New York (193 U. S., 437), to which I will later direct your attention.

The case of Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.) decided that a county judge acting in administrative capacity who at the beginning of the year selected those who were to serve on the juries of the several courts during the following 12 months excluded Negroes because of race violated a constitutional Federal statute enforcing the "nondiscrimination on account of race" provision and the "equal protection" clause of the Constitution.

In Ex parte Virginia, Judge Cales had done a necessary act to put in motion, and had put in motion, in so far as supplying jury material was concerned, the judicial machinery of the State of Virginia, in the county of Pittsylvania, which, under the impetus given by him, was to run for 12 months. He did not act against any individual. As an agent of the State, he made the State dispense to litigants during the 12 months' jury panels, selected with such bias against the blacks as to deny to all of them, as contrasted with their white neighbors, the equal protection of the law. He put out of balance the scales of justice in his county, so that the judicial machinery could not afford "equal protection." At least so runs the Government's theory in such cases.

In the Telephone case, the city of Los Angeles held from the State of California the general power to fix the rates of service charge. The city fixed a confiscatory rate in violation of both the State and the Federal Constitution. The jurisdiction of the Federal court was challenged on the ground that if the rate was confiscatory, which would give the supreme court jurisdiction, it was also in violation of the State constitution, which fact would deny such jurisdiction to that court, because the act done in violation of the constitution of the State could not be the act of the State. The court held that since the city of Los Angeles had the general power to fix telephone rates, was acting under color of that authority, the rates being actually in operation, its act was the act of the State within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. It was a procedure against an act of a unit of the State government, actually governing within certain territorial and governmental limits, and in this particular instance was presuming to act as a unit of the State government under its general and specific powers delegated to it by the State.

The act denounced by the provision of this bill under consideration has no reference to anything done under color of State authority under the claim of a right granted by the State to do it. The effect of the charge in the Federal indictment under this clause would be to charge that the defendant owed a duty under State law as an agent of the State to act for the State and do a certain thing and that he failed to so act for the State. In the Burney case, One hundred and ninety-third United States, the Supreme Court held that the act of a subordinate officer done in violation of law was not the act of the State within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. That is the position which we take with reference to this part of section 3 of the bill.

Gentlemen, I do not want to presume upon your interest and attention by proceeding further into the refinements of judicial construction. I realize that in practice the House is not turned aside by any silken threads spun across the pathway of its inclination. While the decisions of the Supreme Court, when they shall have become fixed in construction, mark the boundary line beyond which the Congress can not go, after all, the Congress in every instance must exercise an independent judgment as to its own constitutional powers; and if in its independent judgment the Constitution fixes for it a more restricted limitation than the judgments of the Supreme Court impose it must hold itself, of course, within the confines which in its own judgment the Constitution establishes. When the decisions of the Supreme Court do not mark the outer boundary line, or move the line here and there by changing and conflicting opinion, the Congress, in a more absolute and comprehensive sense, must rely upon its independent judgment.

Fortunately for us from the standpoint of the necessity of an independent judgment as to questions of constitutionality, this is the only provision of this bill with regard to which such judgment is necessary. The others were destroyed by direct judicial determinations prior to the introduction of the bill. This provision is dead also, but the others had been pronounced dead, enshrouded by the Supreme Court, given an orderly funeral interment, and their names and dates of death carved on their respective tombstones. It was a ghoulish thing to rob the graveyard and bring in here these poor remains which have been in process of decay, some of them since 1872. Supporters of this bill here and throughout the country talk as though there is no Federal law now to protect the citizen in his constitutional rights. There is now a Federal statute in effect which is as broad in its application and in its protections against wrongs inflicted by mobs and other conspirators as are the rights and privileges conferred by the entire Constitution. It is section 5508, which contains this language:

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured by him by the Constitution or laws of the United States * * * they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

You can not make a constitutional law against mobs or any other conspiracies broader than that, and you can not stretch the Constitution to fit the law, as is attempted by section 2 of this bill.

No right of the individual arising under the Constitution can be transgressed against by conspirators which is not protected by the act referred to, and, conversely, no right of the citizen which this act does not protect as against conspirators is a right which he holds under the Constitution, and therefore can be protected by congressional enactment. I submit that as a sound proposition of law and of logic and as of controlling force in any candid attempt at ascertainment of constitutional power and of legislative policy with reference to this matter.

The present law is as broad as the total of the protections conferred by the Constitution. It is not law but constitutional warrant, from your position, which is needed, and that can not be had by the enactment of another unconstitutional statute.

The advocates of this bill can not even hide behind the pleas of uncertainty.

THE SECOND CIVIL RIGHTS ACT.

In 1871 the Congress enacted the second civil rights act. Section 5407 thereof contained this provision:

If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire for the purpose of impeding, hindering, obstructing, or defeating in any manner the due course of justice in any State or Territory, with intent to deny to any citizen the equal protection of the laws, * * * each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

In a footnote, McKinney's Federal Statutes Annotated, it is explained that this section was repealed by section 341 and not embodied in the Penal Code, possibly because section 5519, which contained similar provisions, was held unconstitutional in United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629).

Section 5519, also a part of the second civil rights act, provided:

If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire, or go in disguise on the highway or on the premises of another, for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The author appends the following note:

It was repealed by section 341, this title, but its provisions were not embodied in the code, possibly because it was held unconstitutional in United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629).

This bill is met at the threshold of procedure here, Mr. Chairman, with the definite denial by the Supreme Court that Congress possesses the constitutional power to enact its provisions. There is not the slightest question about that.

The Harris case referred to was a lynching case. There was no question as to the existence of a Federal law under which indictment and prosecution could be had. The law provided that—

If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire * * * for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws, each of said persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

No question was raised as to the sufficiency of the indictment or the regularity of procedure thereunder. The sole question was as to the constitutional power to enact such a law, and the court held, as clearly as language can declare, that no such power existed. Congress agreed with the holding of the court and failed to reenact the statute in the subsequent codification.

The Riggins and the Powell cases were lynching cases. The law under which they were prosecuted is still on the statute books. No question was raised as to the law per se. The procedure had admitted its sufficiency, and the fact that in its scope, aside from the question of constitutional limitations, it comprehended the offense charge. The sole question was as to whether the crime of lynching is one which under the Constitution Congress can legislate to prevent. With the issue squarely before it, the court held it was not. The law stands there now on the statute books of the Nation to protect the individual against every transgression of every sort committed by conspirators against the constitutional rights and privileges which the citizen may have under the fourteenth amendment, and under every other provision of the Constitution from its first section to the end of its last amendment.

If the circumstances which attend this bill were of the normal sort, I would leave the consideration of constitutional power here, but under the present circumstances I feel that the independent judgment as to that of the House should invoke part of section 3, which constitutes the proponents' first and last line of defense.

In seeking to determine the constitutionality of any given proposition, it is not the measure proposed but the constitutional power required as a basis for the measure which comes under consideration. It is not merely what is proposed to be done but what can be done, if that which is proposed may be done, which brings the constitutional question into clear development for examination.

There is no difference between the Federal power, whatever it may be, to prosecute a State officer in a Federal court for failure to protect against murder, and the power to prosecute and punish him under a penal code enacted by Congress for failure to protect against simple assault, and no difference between the Federal power required to punish for failure to protect the person and to punish for the failure to protect property. I assume nobody will deny that. The powers conferred by the fourteenth amendment are in general terms and cover, to whatever extent it goes, both property and person. If the constitutional power is held by the Federal Government to do what is proposed in this provision referred to, it can provide for the punishment in a Federal court of police officers who fail to carry out the congressional edict to them with reference to the protection of the property on their "beats," the prevention of all violence to persons, and so forth.

It can go up the line and establish congressional supervision over the governor of the State with reference to his official acts touching the protection of the person and property of his people. I assume nobody will challenge that statement. Under this identical provision as it stands, if constitutional, it would be possible to prosecute the governor of a State and send him to a Federal penitentiary for the violation of this congressional edict and direction with regard to his duty in the protection of the citizens of his own State. I realize this is not controlling if in fact the power were granted, but it is highly persuasive in resolving doubt in construction as to whether the States granted such power.

This is not a provision to negative discriminatory State action. It does not tend to preserve the harmony of the general plan of government. It tends to destroy it. That fact is also persuasive as against presumption that any such thing was intended. It seeks to invoke, and must depend for its constitutionality upon the existence of a Federal power to supervise and overlord the agents of the State while acting as such, holding them constantly under the controlling influence of a superior Federal authority, clothed with the power over every State officer to remove him from the discharge of the duties for which the people of the State had chosen him, and arraign him before a Federal court and possibly send him to the Federal penitentiary for something which he had failed to do touching the protection of person or property wholly within the State. I submit to your judgment, gentlemen, that the weight of probability, the weight of reason, the weight of constitutional construction, yea, the plain language of the court establishes that no such power has been delegated to the Federal Government. That would be a power to destroy, second only, if in fact not equal, to the power to destroy by taxation. It is the power to strip the State of its executive personnel, and by a less certain inclusion, its legislative and judicial personnel also. No less a constitutional power than that can support section 3, the provision of this bill under consideration. The Supreme Court has not established any such power as existing in the Federal Government. It can not declare it without being guilty of judicial brigandage. But, gentlemen, I am not discussing this matter before the Supreme Court.

I am discussing it before the greatest legislative body on earth, the sworn defenders of the Constitution and the keepers of their own consciences. It is to their independent judgment which no tribunal on earth can coerce, though the Supreme Court can limit the scope of its exercise, that of appeal.

There is nothing in the political history of our country, nothing in its tradition, nothing in its plan of government, nothing in the contemporaneous discussion of the fourteenth amendment to indicate that one single State of this Union would have voted ratification of that amendment if there had been the slightest probability that it was capable of a construction which would make the officials of a State answerable in criminal prosecution to the Federal Government for the breach of duty owed to the State touching police administration within the State as is provided by this bill.

The language of the fourteenth amendment is plain. Its meaning is not obscure. To say that a State officer who violates a State law and a duty to his people, by reason of that fact, comes under the superior jurisdiction of the Federal Government as against the State whose officer he is, on the theory that his act done against his public duty as an officer of the State was the act of the State, is the height of absurdity in construction and conclusion. When a State provides in its legislative, executive, and judicial branches for the equal protection of all its people, prescribes pains and penalities for the failure of its officer personnel to afford equal protection, in the event of a breach of duty by any of its officers, there does not arise the fact of Federal jurisdiction or any assumption that its exercise is necessary or would be helpful.

If the Federal Government must supervise the official personnel of a State, it ought to create that personnel. There ought to be no State governments. That is the direction in which this legislation leads. Let nobody misunderstand that. If you convince public opinion that this sort of legislation is necessary and that it is sound in governmental principle, you can not stem the tide that is now in motion in that direction with ever-increasing momentum. This is not the responsibility of the Supreme Court; this is your responsibility now.

The opponents of this measure have a right to assume, and do assume, that unless the proponents of the measure establish constitutional authority for its enactment, the Members of the House will not stultify themselves by its enactment. The Members of the Congress of the United States, guided by the decisions of the Supreme Court, are in the first instance the judges of their own constitutional powers and limitations, and by their oaths are compelled to observe those limitations, at least in the presence of their clear ascertainment. As a matter of fact, during the progress of legislation there is no presumption in favor of legislative authority on the part of the legislative body operating under delegated, limited powers. Certainly when the authority has come under serious question, the burden rests upon the proponents to establish the power to legislate, and we respectfully challenge them to do it.

They can not do it. Oh, you may say you have the votes. I hope you will not take that position. I do not believe you will. A court could say the same thing with no greater right. I challenge not the power, but I challenge the right of any man to stand in his place here and with his hand uplifted take the oath administered by the Speaker of the House, and then return to his seat and vote for a measure which he knows is unconstitutional. I do not mean to be offensive, gentlemen, but that is a sacrifice which no man owes to his party. But not to make that sacrifice he owes to himself, to those who bear his name, to his country, and to his God. It will be a sad day in this country, if it ever should come, when the party lash can drive an individual legislator to the breach of the highest obligation which can rest upon the conscience of a man. I think somebody has misjudged this House. We hear it on every hand, that you have the votes and you are going to put this measure through. I trust you will not.

Looking beyond the mere question of constitutional limitations, I desire to make it clear that the objection to this bill which has been urged upon the ground that it is destructive of the power, the prestige, and the independent governmental responsibility and efficiency of the States is not based upon any abstract political doctrine or theory with regard to State rights. There is a demonstrated wisdom in our general plan of government. The reservation by the States of the general police power was not merely that the States might preserve their dignity and the pride of governmental importance. There was and is a more substantial reason.

It is a fact, not a theory merely, that since the formative period of government all progress in government has held to that general direction which places not the right to govern, but the necessity to govern, as close to the individual citizen as under all the circumstances it is practicable to place that responsibility. It is not merely the right of the people of the States to govern in matters of police control against which this bill offends. That is not important. It is against the necessity to govern that this bill offends and grievously offends. That necessity is the one thing of paramount importance which must be preserved if governmental progress is to be maintained, and the grapple with governmental difficulties held close to the people as a mighty contributing agency toward human progress. It offends against the development of the sense of justice among the people, which always results from the consciousness of responsibility. It offends against the growth of the ability to govern which comes with the exercise of that ability.

These difficulties of government in matters like that against which this bill is directed, the things which are wrong, the things which must be accomplished, constitute a large part of nature's great gymnasium of difficulties. This bill violates not only the Constitution, but it violates the philosophy of government. It is contrary to the lessons drawn from governmental experience and it violates the comprehensive schemes of life by shifting the responsibility of dealing with an important governmental duty which is within the governmental capacity of the States, from the States, in which the citizen has a larger share of power and responsibility, to the great Federal Government, where his influence is incomparably less and his sense of responsibility correspondingly less.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 13 had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent—

Mr. CODD was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

Mr. HUMPHREYS was granted leave of absence, for 10 days, on account of illness of wife.

Mr. KINDRED was granted leave of absence, for two weeks, on account of personal illness.

Mr. CLASSON was granted leave of absence for 10 days.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. LEE of New York was granted leave of absence, for 10 days, on account of death in the family.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask to take a bill from the Speaker's table——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. LONDON. It is with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this time, and the Chair can not recognize the gentleman for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's desk the bill H. R. 6998 and move to concur in the Senate amendments. The bill passed the House by unanimous consent and passed the Senate by unanimous consent, but there are some technical errors which ought to be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is more convenient for the conduct of orderly business for gentlemen desiring to call up a bill to consult the Speaker in advance. The Chair lays before the House H. R. 6998 with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 6998) to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the act of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, January 5, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 543), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9108) granting an increase of pension to Edward Henderson, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STOLL: A bill (H. R. 9717) to amend an act (public, No. 219) approved July 1, 1902, authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish discharge certificates; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 9718) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Whitewater, Walworth County, Wis.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9719) to provide for the erection of an addition to and the remodeling of the Federal building in the city of Kenosha, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CABLE: A bill (H. R. 9720) to consolidate, codify, revise, reenact, and establish a uniform law to prevent corrupt practice in the election of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, and providing a penalty for the violation of the same; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. PORTER: A bill (H. R. 9721) for the promotion of certain officers of the United States Army now on the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MacGREGOR: A bill (H. R. 9722) to provide for the payment by advertisers of postage on replies to advertising matter; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. LARSON of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 9723) to authorize suits or actions against collectors or their successors in office in certain cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MADDEN: A bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9725) to prescribe the method of printing Government securities and other printed paper executed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 9726) to authorize the printing of certain publications of the executive departments and independent establishments of the Government, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. PARRISH: A bill (H. R. 9727) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Bowie, Tex.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MADDEN: A bill (H. R. 9728) to provide that the expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board shall be assessed semiannually upon the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KISSEL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 248) declaring October 12 a legal public holiday to be known as Columbus day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to donate and grant certain buildings in Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. BRITTEN: Resolution (H. Res. 257) substituting $125,000,000 in reparations for 134,112 unnecessary troops; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. VOLK: Resolution (H. Res. 258) to appoint a select committee to inquire into the subject of narcotic addiction in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 259) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit certain facts in his possession concerning treatment of narcotic drug addiction; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we would reverently approach Thy throne of grace this morning, confident that the same love that has been vouchsafed, the same tender regard amidst our difficulties and anxieties, will still be continued unto us. We beseech Thee for Thine own help all along the pathway of duty, and finally, when the day ends with us, may we be able to look into Thy face and say we have tried to fulfill the trust committed to us. We ask in Christ's name. Amen.

JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, appeared in his seat to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

REPORT OF ARMY HORSE-BREEDING OPERATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of expenditures under the appropriation of $250,000 for encouraging the breeding of riding horses suitable for the Army, etc., contained in the Army appropriation act approved June 5, 1920, together with a statement of the means adopted for carrying the provision of law into effect, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6998) to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6998) to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented two telegrams in the nature of memorials from Charles M. Griffith and Fred Bearden, chairman executive committee, Camp Stafford Post, No. 50, American Legion, and William Griffin, William B. Hays, and Eddie Dunham, committee for Patient Body Hospital, No. 27, all of Alexandria, La., remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the medical personnel of Reserve Corps, United States Public Health Service, to civilian status, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ELKINS presented memorials of Federation No. 27, employees of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad system, of Fairmont, and Local Union No. 4193, United Mine Workers of America, of Hildebrand, both in the State of West Virginia, protesting against the alleged deplorable conditions of families of working people in the coal fields of West Virginia and conditions approaching industrial and economic anarchy in that region, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILLIS presented resolutions adopted by the Central Labor Union of Dayton and Local Union No. 292, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance, of Massillon, both in the State of Ohio, protesting against the appointment of additional Federal judges or increase of salaries for such judges, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McNARY presented two joint memorials of the Legislature of Oregon, which were ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Whereas there are in the United States to-day approximately 20,000,000 acres of agricultural land which may be reclaimed through irrigation, and a large area subject to reclamation by drainage or diking, representing one of the great undeveloped resources of the Nation; and

Whereas the State of Oregon is deeply and vitally interested in the question of irrigation, drainage, and diking, as there are to-day in the State of Oregon 1,250,000 acres in projects completed or partially completed, and it is estimated that there are an additional 1,000,000 acres of land which are capable of being irrigated, in addition to large areas of land which may be reclaimed through drainage and diking; and

Whereas in the annual report of the Department of the Interior it is estimated that the Federal Government should receive through royalties, rentals, and leases of public lands a total of $12,387,500,000, of which 45 per cent is to be used for reclamation purposes; and

Whereas there is now before the Congress of the United States a bill known as the McNary-Smith reclamation bill, introduced by Senator McNARY of Oregon and a companion bill by Representative SMITH of Idaho, which calls for a total appropriation of $350,000,000 for reclamation purposes, to be made available over a period of years, beginning in 1922; and

Whereas the necessary advances for reclamation purposes under the McNary-Smith bill can undoubtedly be made without placing an excessive burden upon the taxpayers, due to the fact that large revenues will be accruing to the Federal Government, as shown by the annual report of the Department of the Interior and due also to the fact that the advances made under the McNary-Smith bill constitute a revolving fund, which is finally repaid to the Federal Government in full; and

Whereas the McNary-Smith reclamation bill provides that preference be given, both in employment and priority of filing on reclaimed lands, to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served during the World War: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the joint assembly of the senate and house of representatives, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized to pass the McNary-Smith reclamation bill at the present session; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and a copy to each Senator and Representative in Congress from Oregon.

Adopted by the senate, December 10, 1921.

ROY W. RITNER,
President of the Senate.

Adopted by the house, December 20, 1921.

LOUIS E. BEAN,
Speaker of the House.

Indorsed: Senate joint memorial No. 1. Introduced by Senators Hall and Upton. John P. Hunt, chief clerk. Filed: December 21, 1921. Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of Senate joint memorial No. 1, adopted by the Thirty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, special session, 1921, with the original thereof, filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon December 21, 1921, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 22d day of December, A. D. 1921.

[SEAL.] SAM A. KOZER, Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial 5.

To the honorable Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas 23 years have elapsed since our soldiers were called upon to go into an alien country, to wit, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas because of the lack of supplies, the change of climate, the daily exactions required by the soldiery, the exposure to the weather, as well as the guerilla warfare carried on with the Spaniards and later with the natives, has left many of the soldiers in a helpless, dependent, and destitute condition; and

Whereas said volunteer soldiers have not been dealt with by their Government with respect to their general welfare to relieve suffering and want as should have been by a Government of such bountiful resources: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to take such action and give such consideration and relief to the needs and welfare of the soldiers of the Spanish-American War as is just and right in that any of such soldiers might be relieved from dependent, destitute, or helpless condition in which they now exist; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Oregon be directed to transmit by mail a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Congressmen from the State of Oregon.

Adopted by the senate December 22, 1921.

ROY W. RITNER,
President of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house December 22, 1921.

LOUIS E. BEAN,
Speaker of the House.

Indorsed: Senate joint memorial No. 5. Introduced by Senator Dennis. John P. Hunt, chief clerk. Filed December 23, 1921. Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 5, adopted by the Thirty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, special session, 1921, with the original thereof, filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon December 23, 1921, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

Secretary of State.

EXTENSION OF OIL OR GAS PERMITS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8344) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 376) thereon. This is an emergency matter, and I am asked by the committee to request unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I am familiar with the bill to extend the time for performance of work which has been reported from the committee and know that it is an emergency matter of the gravest character. There are now all over the West leasers and prospectors without protection under the general oil leasing bill by reason of a defect in the law which this measure will cure. I trust that it may be passed without opposition or delay.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say that I introduced an identical bill in the Senate, but the House took action upon the matter first, and passed this bill. I am very anxious to have the Senate pass the bill so as to give the required relief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that any oil or gas permittee has been unable, with the exercise of diligence, to begin drilling operations or to drill wells of the depth and within the time prescribed by section 13 of the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stats., p. 437), extend the time for beginning such drilling or completing it, to the amount specified in the act for such time, not exceeding three years, and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill.

The report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8344) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The purpose of this legislation is set forth in House report No. 499, which reads as follows:

[House Report No. 499, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.]

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8344) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following minor amendment:

On page 1, line 7, strike out the comma after the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(Forty-first Statutes, p. 437)" and a comma.

The purpose of the bill is to give the Secretary of the Interior discretion to grant extension of time to oil and gas permittees to begin drilling operations or to drill wells to the required depth under the mineral land leasing act, approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat., 437), in meritorious cases, such as climatic conditions, inability to secure machinery, and other reasons beyond the control of the permittee.

The bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands at the request of E. C. Finney, Acting Secretary of the Interior. The reasons why the legislation is deemed desirable and necessary in the opinion of the department is set out in a letter to the chairman of this committee dated August 18, 1921, which letter is set out in full for the information of the House, as well as a communication from John Barton Payne, Secretary of the Interior, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated January 12, 1921, relative to extension of time for complying with conditions of oil and gas permit.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 18, 1921.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SINNOTT: Section 13 of the oil leasing act approved February 25, 1920, provides that permittees shall begin drilling within six months from date of permit; shall drill one or more wells to a depth of 500 feet within one year and to a depth of not less than 2,000 feet within two years. The statute further provides that the Secretary of the Interior may, if permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to test the land in the time granted by the permit, extend same for not exceeding two years. You will observe that there is no authority for granting extension of time within which to begin drilling or within which to sink wells to a depth of 500 feet the first year or 2,000 feet within two years.

Approximately 11,000 applications for permits have been filed. A very large number have been approved. By reason of climatic conditions, inability to secure drilling rigs and machinery, or other reasons beyond the control of the permittee, many of them have been unable to begin drilling within the six months' period and will be unable to get wells down 500 feet in depth within one year.

Recognizing the condition confronting the department, and as a result of numerous petitions filed, the Secretary, on January 12, 1921, while holding as I have already indicated, stated that this department would not proceed against any such permit because of failure to begin drilling within six months if such failure was due to causes beyond the applicant's control, provided he did begin as soon thereafter as possible and furnished proof of work performed at the expiration of the year.

Some of the permittees, while proceeding in the utmost good faith, will be unable to furnish proof of drilling 500 feet within the first year. You will readily see that it will be physically impossible for all of them to secure enough drilling rigs, casing, etc., to comply with the law. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that we should have legislative authority, by act or resolution, which would give the Secretary discretion to grant extensions of time in meritorious cases. I therefore submit for your consideration and introduction, if it meets your approval, a draft of a bill conferring such authority.

Sincerely,

E. C. FINNEY, Acting Secretary.

RELATIVE TO EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLYING WITH CONDITIONS OF OIL AND GAS PERMIT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 12, 1921.

THE COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: With your memorandum of January 8, 1921, you submitted applications for extensions of time within which to commence drilling under oil-prospecting permits issued pursuant to section 13 of the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat., 437).

The statute requires that the permittee shall begin drilling operations within six months from the date of the permit and shall within one year from and after the date of the permit drill one or more wells for oil or gas to a depth of not less than 500 feet each, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, and shall within two years from date of the permit drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered. The Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to test the land in the time granted by the permit, extend any such permit for such time not exceeding two years and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe.

The language of the statute clearly implies, and paragraph 7 of the regulations so construes, that the extension of time authorized may be granted to cover a period of not exceeding two years from and after the date of the expiration of the two years fixed in the permit "to test the land." Consequently, an extension at the end of six months would not be premature and not specifically authorized by statute.

However, the department is aware that under many of the permits issued the principal part or all of the six months' period within which to begin drilling will fall in the winter season when drilling may be impracticable in many sections of the country. There may be other cases where, for good and sufficient reasons, permittees are unable to begin drilling within the six months' period.

Therefore, no action will be taken looking to the cancellation of a permit issued under section 13 of the oil and gas leasing act for failure to begin drilling operations within six months from date of the permit if the permittee or his assignee exercises due diligence, and because of climatic conditions or other reasons beyond his control has been unable to begin actual drilling within six months.

Every permittee or his assignee claiming under a permit issued under section 13 of the oil and gas leasing act shall, within 12 months and 10 days from the date of his permit, file in the local land office of the district in which the land is situated a corroborated affidavit specifically describing the work done upon the land embraced therein, together with such other information as may be pertinent as to his operations thereon.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN BARTON PAYNE,
Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2091. An act for the relief of George E. Yeadon (Rept. No. 377);

S. 2471. An act to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof," approved July 28, 1914 (38th Stats. L., p. 558) (Rept. No. 378);

H. R. 1459. An act for the relief of Charles R. Powell (Rept. No. 379);

H. R. 2865. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to J. D. Calhoun, of Lincoln Parish, La., certain lands (Rept. No. 380);

H. R. 7290. An act to confirm private land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier (Rept. No. 381);

H. R. 7600. An act authorizing the adjustment of the boundaries of the Deschutes National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 382); and

H. J. Res. 30. Joint resolution to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry," approved February 14, 1920 (Rept. No. 383).

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 2147) to patent to the Ed. E. Richardson Co. (Inc.) certain lands, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 384) thereon.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I wish to make an inquiry, as the Senator was in charge of the bill when it passed the Senate, as to what progress is being made in carrying out the provisions of the appropriation of $20,000,000 to feed the Russians.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the first shipload of corn has already left for Russia. I think Mr. Hoover is doing everything possible, with his assistants, to get the grain to the seacoast and ship it just as fast as it is possible for human energy to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Is the corn or other material being carried in private ships or in Government-owned ships?

Mr. SMOOT. Most of it will be carried in Government ships, as I understand it. I do not know whether the first ship load was carried in a Government ship or not, but I do know that it is the program that the corn is to be carried in Government ships.

Mr. BORAH. I will state to the Senator that the reason why I asked the question is because I have understood they have declined to permit Mr. Hoover to use the Government ships and that he is being compelled to carry the grain in private ships.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the first I have heard of it, and I will say to the Senator from Idaho that within 30 minutes I will ascertain whether there is any truth in the report.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I noticed in the newspapers day before yesterday that one ship load was going over and that it was a Government ship.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator from Idaho has said there is a report now that the Shipping Board has refused to allow Government ships to carry the corn. I do not know whether that is true or not. I have just heard the report for the first time. I will know within 30 minutes whether there is any truth in it.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington. On behalf of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is necessarily absent, I introduce a bill for reference to the Foreign Relations Committee.

By Mr. JONES of Washington (for Mr. LODGE):

A bill (S. 2923) to establish the United States section of the Inter-American High Commission, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. KEYES:

A bill (S. 2924) making appropriations for the further investigation and control of the white pine blister rust; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. TOWNSEND (by request):

A bill (S. 2926) providing that proposed legislation dealing with Indian affairs be submitted to Indian councils; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 2927) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Bristol, Va., one cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2928) donating a 155-millimeter Schneider howitzer gun to the city of Girard, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 2929) granting a pension to Ernest F. Grimm; and

A bill (S. 2930) granting a pension to Noah C. Reynolds; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 2931) to authorize appropriations for the survey, construction, and maintenance of highways on or adjacent to untaxed Indian lands; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2932) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the compensation of laborers in the customs service as he may think advisable; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 153) to authorize the loan by the Secretary of War to the Virginia Polytechnic Institute of tents, cots, blankets, and pillows to be used during celebration of fiftieth anniversary of founding of institute from May 10 to June 10, 1922; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO ACT PROTECTING MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. BURSUM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on the 13th day of December I gave notice of my intention to present an amendment to Rule XIX of the Senate. Pursuant to that notice I now present the amendment.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator ask for its consideration now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 204) submitted by Mr. JONES of Washington, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, to be numbered 7, as follows:

7. Debate shall be confined to the question under consideration, unless otherwise provided by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the Committee on Rules are considering a proposition that would involve this question. While I do not think it is really necessary that it should be referred to that committee, yet under the circumstances I ask that the proposed amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment which has been proposed to the rule, it is designed to confine discussion to the measure pending before the Senate, which I think is a very wise rule, and the only kind of cloture, if it can be termed cloture, that I would ever support. The only question which troubles me is how to enforce the rule. It seems to me that there will be very little difficulty in adopting the rule if we can devise a practical method by which to enforce it. In the House of Commons they seem to have no difficulty in doing so, but the situation is a little different here. I sincerely hope that the committee will work out some practical method of enforcing the rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I suggest to the Senator that in another body—and I do not think it would be improper to refer to it in this connection, the House of Representatives—they have a similar rule, and they have no difficulty in enforcing it. If a point of order is made, the Chair passes upon it. Of course, there is the right of appeal, and so on. I think under that procedure the rule could be very well enforced here.

The Senator will note also that I have made special provision in the proposed amendment so that if a Senator is so disposed, he may make a point of order, or if anyone desires to ask unanimous consent that he may proceed without discussing the matter under consideration and unanimous consent is given, of course he can then proceed. I take it that the rule would be enforced just as the rule is enforced in the House of Representatives, by a point of order being made and the Chair passing upon it, without debate, under the other rules which we have.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Idaho, and also to the Senator from Washington, that in my opinion the criticism leveled against the Senate on yesterday—and the same criticism has been made heretofore—is scarcely warranted. I think a comparison of the business transacted by the Senate with that transacted by the House of Representatives will show that the Senate passes as many, if not more, bills than are passed by the House of Representatives; indeed, I think the curse of the age is that we have too much legislation.

If I may make one observation in reply to the Senator from Idaho, I desire to say that I think a cloture rule would be a very great disadvantage; indeed, would be a great wrong. The sovereign States are represented here in the Senate of the United States. I do not think that the representatives of the sovereign States should be denied the free opportunity to discuss public questions.

Mr. BORAH. I did not say that I was in favor of cloture, and I do not know that the proposed amendment to the rules, if adopted, could be construed as being a form of cloture, though it is sometimes referred to in that way. I said that it is the only form of cloture which I would support, if it be considered cloture.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment——

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to say that I am thoroughly in favor, however, of some modus operandi or some rule by which we may confine the discussion in this Chamber to the subject before the body; but I think the difficulty of enforcing the rule will be found greater than the Senator from Washington contemplates.

I have given a good deal of consideration to the matter during the last year, and the more I have considered it the more difficult I have found it to devise a plan which would make the rule effective. The House of Representatives has not been very successful, as the debates in the House will show. In the reports of the debates in the House of Commons it will be found that as the discussion runs along there is no subject discussed except the subject which is before that House; but they have a different situation there, which I need not go into at this time, by which they can control the matter. However, I have great confidence in the Committee on Rules of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the proposal of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], in my opinion, will not materially change the rules of the Senate as they now exist. The rules of this body contemplate that when a Senator addresses the Senate he shall address his remarks to the subject or issue pending before the Senate. The difficulty growing out of the situation is due to the fact that under the precedents of the Senate the Senator having the floor is himself the judge as to whether he is discussing the question before the Senate, and sometimes, as we know, his decision seems to be very poorly supported by the facts.

The practice of the House of Representatives is certainly not to be preferred to the practice of the Senate. The rules of the Senate, as I have just said, contemplate that a Senator when he addresses this body shall confine himself to the question at issue, but the Chair has never held a Senator out of order when that Senator has stated that he is speaking to the subject under consideration.

In the House of Representatives there is what is known as general debate. When the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of an appropriation bill time is allotted for general debate, and during general debate on that appropriation bill any Member who can get the floor may speak on any subject that he chooses. In addition to that there exists what is known as the privilege of extension of remarks. Any Member of the House who can get consent to do so may print a discussion of any question at any length that he pleases.

If the Senator from Washington wants to change the rules of the Senate, and prevent the latitude of debate which now exists, in my opinion he will have explicitly and expressly to vest in the Presiding Officer of the Senate the power to determine when a Senator is transgressing the rule that requires him to speak to the subject at issue. Any Senator may now raise the point of order that the Senator speaking is not addressing himself to the subject at issue. The Chair has often addressed to a Senator occupying the floor the inquiry whether he was speaking to the subject at issue; and if he replied that he was, under the precedents of the Senate the Chair has not restrained or directed him.

Therefore, if the Senator from Washington wants to change the rules and compel a Senator to submit to the discretion of the Chair in the decision of the question as to whether or not he is directing his remarks to the subject at issue, he will have to modify the rule which he proposes so as to provide that the Chair shall be empowered to determine the question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think the Senator can find in the rules of the Senate any rule which bears out his contention. Furthermore, I remember that heretofore in the proceedings of the Senate in several instances where a Senator made the point of order that the Senator speaking was not confining himself to the question at issue, the Presiding Officer held that the Senator addressing the Senate could talk about anything he desired to talk about, nor did the Presiding Officer refer the decision of the matter to the Senator who was himself speaking.

I will say frankly to the Senator that the purpose of my amendment, of course, is to do what the Senator would have it do under the express provision which he suggests; and if such an express provision is necessary I should be glad to have it inserted in the proposed addition to the rule. I think, however, under the Rules of the Senate, with this proposed paragraph as a part of Rule XIX, the Chair could pass upon the question and would be authorized to do so; but if he would not be, such authorization could be made perfectly plain in the proposed rule so that there might not be any question about his authority.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, notwithstanding the suggestions of the Senator from Washington, which are undoubtedly based upon actual instances, the fact remains that under general parliamentary law anyone who addresses a body in session anywhere is required to discuss the subject at issue. That is the rule of the Senate; it is just as much the rule of the Senate as is any written rule that we have; but the difficulty in its enforcement, as I have already stated, grows out of the fact that under the practice of the Senate the speaker is made the judge as to whether or not he is complying with the rule rather than the Presiding Officer of this body. As I have heretofore said, I do not think that the rule proposed by the Senator from Washington will materially change the existing rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, we have had a great deal of discussion in the Senate on the subject of cloture, but nothing has ever come of it. Senators are constantly comparing the method of procedure of this body with that of the body at the other end of the Capitol, and frequently reference is made to the limitations upon debate there imposed. I think, however, that experience has shown that the practice of this body is preferable to that of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator that I agree with him absolutely as to that, having reference, of course, to the procedure of the two bodies generally. If the Senator will permit me further, I wish to say that I agree fully with the Senator from Idaho that I would not support any other form of cloture or any form of cloture that went further than the one proposed by the resolution. I believe that we should have the utmost freedom of debate here, and I think our procedure is much better than that of the other body.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course the difficulty growing out of the rule which gives the Presiding Officer the arbitrary power to say when a Senator is confining his remarks to the subject at issue must suggest itself to every Senator. It is regarded as having had the effect of destroying the freedom of debate in almost every body where it has ever been applied. It has been my practice to limit my observations to the question at issue. Even while a Member of the House of Representatives I rarely indulged in the privilege of extension of remarks or the privilege of general debate to discuss questions that were not pending before the body, and I have never undertaken in the Senate to discuss questions not pending here.

I very much doubt whether we will be able to write a rule that will improve the procedure of the Senate. The principle of confining discussion to the subject at issue is meritorious, and I think in all ordinary cases the Chair probably could be relied upon to decide the question with fairness and accuracy, but I can conceive of conditions in which the public interest might be made to suffer by imposing upon the Presiding Officer the obligation to determine the question as to whether or not a Senator was confining himself to the subject at issue.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question because of his long experience in the House of Representatives, where there prevails to-day a rule, which is enforced, except in the case of general debate to which the Senator has already referred, that the Member must direct his remarks to the question at issue. While it is true, as the Senator from Arkansas has suggested, that there is a possibility of an abuse by the Presiding Officer in connection with the enforcement of such a rule, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas if in all his experience in the House of Representatives, regardless of which party happened to be in power, he has ever known of a Speaker of that body even to be charged with any attempt to abuse the discretion that was placed in him in passing on the question whether a Member was speaking to the question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I recall instances in which very violent and aggressive charges have been made that the Speaker was acting in a tyrannical, overbearing, and outrageous manner, in connection with which language was used that would hardly be regarded as "becoming an officer and a gentleman." I do not say that I know of instances where, in my opinion, the Speaker acted arbitrarily upon such a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may make a further suggestion to the Senator, I am not trying by my question to bring out the Senator's judgment as to whether the Speaker acted in an arbitrary manner or anything of that kind; I am confining my question solely to the one proposition——

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I understood the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, does the Senator know of instances where it was alleged that the Speaker was unfair in deciding that a Member was talking to or not talking to the question at issue?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; there were frequent controversies of that character during my service in the House of Representatives, when Members who were called to order insisted that they were complying with the rules and that the Speaker was acting in an arbitrary manner in seeking to interrupt their remarks on the point of order being made.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let me ask the Senator whether he recalls any instance where, in his judgment, the Speaker wrongfully exercised an arbitrary power to deprive a Member of the right to talk?

Mr. ROBINSON. I anticipated the Senator's question, and stated in answer to his former question that I do not now recall any incident where, in my opinion, the Speaker acted unfairly and arbitrarily. I made that statement in answer to the Senator's former question, because I realized that the second question was the logical result of the answer to the first question.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not catch the Senator's first statement.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not hear the resolution read, and so far I have been unable to gather just exactly what the issue is; but from what I have heard it seems to me that as long as we have in this body the rule of unlimited debate, which encourages Senators to speak for three or four hours, it would be unreasonable to expect them to discuss the subject at issue all the time. Under this resolution, if there should be a lapse for 30 minutes, we will say, from attention to the subject, at that particular time the Member would be subject to a point of order and taken off his feet, I presume.

Mr. ROBINSON. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada, I confess that it has been very difficult for me many times to follow the arguments of my colleagues, as no doubt at times it has been equally difficult for them to follow the arguments submitted by myself; but I am in sympathy with the principle that when a Senator speaks he should talk about what is before the Senate. I think the practice that prevails in another body, that permits general discussion of every conceivable subject while an appropriation bill is pending, is very bad, and almost useless. It certainly ought not to be applied here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply want to make a suggestion. Several of the practices referred to as being followed in another body are followed by reason of other specific rules. My recollection is that in the other body they have a specific rule permitting and providing for this general debate, thereby taking it out from under the rule that is submitted here; and so with various other propositions that have been referred to here.

EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEYS BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered Senate resolution 191, asking for certain information from the Alien Property Custodian. Reference was made to that resolution yesterday. I now move that it be taken from the table, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to take from the table the resolution referred to by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by the Senate, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian is directed to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian and the compensation which has been allowed to each, and the character of services performed by each; the names of all attorneys, directors, supervisors, managers, auditors, or other agents appointed by the Alien Property Custodian to take care of or to have the administration of property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian, with the compensation paid to each or to be paid to each by the Alien Property Custodian or out of the trusts or trust funds in his custody; the names of all attorneys appointed or employed by corporations, agents, or individuals who have been or are acting as administrators or caretakers of property for the Alien Property Custodian and the compensation paid to or to be paid to each; the names of all attorneys who have represented or who now represent claimants to property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian; the names of all attorneys who have represented claimants to whom property has been returned under section 8 of the trading with the enemy act and the compensation allowed each of such attorneys out of the trust or trust funds subject to such claims; a statement and description of all property sold by the Alien Property Custodian, with the names of the corporations or persons to whom sold, and the amount received therefor; and a statement and description of all property seized or demanded by the Alien Property Custodian since the passage of the resolution declaring a state of peace to exist with Germany, Austria, and Hungary.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning where we left off yesterday, No. 279.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, that means that if objection is made the bill will not be taken up?

Mr. CURTIS. I think, under Rule VIII, Senators have a right to move to take up a bill after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

APPOINTMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, out of order I ask leave to introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 2925) providing that the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed from different sections of the United States, and that not more than one member shall be appointed from any one State, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks in reference to the bill which I have just introduced.

For a long time I have hoped that the Chief Executive of the Nation would distribute the appointments of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to have, as nearly as possible, the different geographical sections of the country represented on the commission; but in view of the fact that it does not seem to be the policy of the President to appoint the membership of this commission from different sections, and in some instances, or at least in one instance, there are two members from one State, I have deemed it proper and my duty to introduce a bill requiring that the commissioners shall be appointed from different sections of the United States.

Take the great southern part of our country. It has no representation upon the commission. It seems that from environment and from close contact with the transportation problems of different sections, members apparently are more or less influenced at times by their more familiar knowledge of the interests, as far as they are involved in transportation, of the sections from which they are appointed. Not that they mean to discriminate, but that they are better posted upon and unconsciously more in sympathy probably with the industries of the territory from which they come. Take the personnel of the present commission, and let us see where they are from.

We find that Mr. Hall is from Colorado, Mr. Aitchison is from Oregon, Mr. Eastman is from Massachusetts, Mr. Potter is from New York, Mr. Daniels is from New Jersey, Mr. McChord is from Kentucky, Mr. Campbell is from Washington, Mr. Meyer is from Wisconsin, Mr. Lewis is from Indiana, Mr. Cox is from New Jersey, and Mr. Esch is from Wisconsin. We have upon this commission two members from the State of New Jersey. There are only 11 members, with our 48 States, and yet New Jersey has 2 members upon that commission. Also two members are from Wisconsin.

I do not mean that the members of the commission would not feel disposed to represent the United States in general; but unquestionably the commissioners, in dealing with problems with which they are more familiar, are in a better position to pass upon them and make equitable adjustments than if they have only the information that is brought to them when the particular rate question is pending.

We find that the entire membership is very largely centered in two sections. Take the West: There is a member from Oregon, a member from Colorado, a member from Washington, and in the Middle Northwest two members from Wisconsin.

Mr. RANSDELL. Two members from Wisconsin.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; two members from Wisconsin.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida whether or not it is true that the three Western States that he has mentioned, each of which, he says, has a member upon this commission—Oregon, Colorado, and Washington—are in the same classification territory?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think they are.

Mr. SIMMONS. The country is divided up into districts, and rates are classified according to those districts. I am not sure, but I am rather inclined to believe that these three States are in the same classified territory.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have not any accurate information upon that subject, but I think the Senator from North Carolina is correct in his suggestion.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to say, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, that there is a vast difference as between the intermountain section of the country and the Pacific coast section of the country. The member of the commission from Colorado would have an entirely different viewpoint, or, rather, if these people can be considered as representing local interests at all, he would represent an entirely different situation from that of the members from Oregon or Washington. As between the States of Oregon and Washington, I know of no distinction; but the intermountain section of the country has an entirely different situation from the Pacific coast.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that that is very material. Nearly all the States of the South are within one classification area. Of course, the Southern States differ in their production—the things they produce and the things they market—just as the States of the West differ in the things that they produce and the things they market, but they are all within one freight classification territory, and I have been under the impression that these three States were all within one freight classification territory. I may be in error about that, but the point is that they fix these freight rates differently for these different territories, and there has been a complaint in recent years—a very loud complaint, and a thoroughly justified complaint—coming up from the South, to the effect that the freight rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the southern territory have been higher than in any other territory in the United States, and that the South has been very greatly discriminated against by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the fixing of rates.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. For that reason the South has been insistent for a long time in asking for a member upon this commission, and has not succeeded, as the Senator from Florida has stated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] stated the situation correctly, so far as the West is concerned.

The railroad problems of the United States are not centered around or confined by classification territory. They arise by reason of the peculiarity of the commerce in a particular part of the country. For instance, the problems of the Pacific coast, which are said to be represented by Mr. Aitchison, who at least is familiar with them, are entirely different from the problems of the intermountain country, from which Mr. Campbell, of Spokane, a member of the commission, comes. Mr. Hall, who is from Colorado, may very well be said to be familiar with the problems arising in the territory east of the Rocky Mountains; that is, that broad country extending from the Rocky Mountains to the Missouri River.

The commission already has a member in the classification territory to which the Senator from North Carolina referred. Mr. McChord, of Kentucky, is in the southern classification territory; but I quite agree that that does not meet the suggestion which the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Florida make. This country, extending southeast along the Atlantic Ocean, in which land transportation must meet the competition of ocean transportation, has its peculiar problems as well, and I think it would not be amiss if there were some member of the commission from that country, which includes North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida. There are problems peculiar to that territory, possibly extending to Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was going to ask the Senator if he would not extend it to the Gulf, and take in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the same suggestion can be made about that territory. I am simply trying to put the matter straight, as I understand it, and not get it confused with what may be called classification territory. The situation is difficult enough to deal with at best.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Iowa stated that one of these commissioners now resides in the State of Washington, and that he was supposed to be familiar with the peculiar conditions there, and did the Senator say that Mr. Aitchison resided in Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. Aitchison lives in Oregon.

Mr. SIMMONS. He is familiar with the conditions there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the conversation going on between Senators no doubt is very interesting, but we over here can not hear a word of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was stating that the Senator from Iowa had said that one of these commissioners understood the peculiar conditions in his State—the State of Washington—and that another one of the commissioners understood the peculiar conditions in another State, although the States are very near together.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina desires to speak further, of course I will yield; but I had hoped to conclude in a few moments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was only trying to help the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to have permission to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I decline to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I dislike to be discourteous, but I want to get through, and then I will be glad to hear the Senator.

I thank the Senator from Iowa and also the Senator from North Carolina for their contributions to the debate upon this subject. The statements made by the Senator from Iowa clearly justify my bill and support the purpose of the measure. He illustrated by speaking of different members of the commission having the viewpoints of different sections of the country.

That is just exactly the point I have in mind. That is the reason I introduced the bill, because I consider that they have the viewpoint, whether consciously or unconsciously, of particular sections of the country, and I desire to mention a specific instance.

The Senator referred to Mr. Aitchison. Recently there has come before the Interstate Commerce Commission, formally or informally, the question of lumber rates. Mr. Aitchison, who is from Oregon, as I understand upon reliable authority, was heartily in sympathy with the idea of the railroads making a voluntary reduction of about 16 per cent in the rates on lumber from the West to the Central West and the East; but when the question of a reduction of freight rates upon lumber from the Southern States was raised, Mr. Aitchison, instead of trying to assist in bringing about a voluntary reduction or a forced reduction, if you please, if necessary, in freight rates, balked in every way possible, I am informed, the plan to secure a reduction in the rates upon lumber shipped from the South.

Whether Mr. Aitchison was actuated consciously or unconsciously in this matter I do not know, but coming from the great lumber section of the West he has at least contributed his good offices, I am informed, to obtain a reduction of 16 per cent for the lumber men of the West, and on the other hand has used his good offices to defeat, or at least delay, a reduction of rates on lumber shipped from the South.

What is the result? The extensive lumber industry of my State, and of other Southern States, is threatened with paralysis, because the great reduction given to the lumber people of the West will enable them to bring their lumber into the markets of the central West and the East and sell it at lower prices than the lumber men of the South, practically only one-third of the distance away, will be able to obtain for their lumber, for instance, in New York and territory in that vicinity. This is a concrete case illustrating the fact that the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be centralized in any one particular section of the country.

All we want is a fair deal. All we want is for all sections of the country to be properly represented upon the commission, and that is what I am contending for. The great southern part of the Nation has only one Member who is designated even as coming from the South, Mr. McChord. Mr. McChord comes from Louisville, Ky., on the Ohio River. If the local viewpoint, if the local knowledge gained by a man's residence and his citizenship and his connection with the enterprises of any particular locality has any influence whatever, then the South is without representation upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator before him the record of the case to which he refers?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have not the record, but it was a voluntary reduction made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know nothing about the case to which the Senator refers.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It was a voluntary reduction on the part of the roads touching the West. Mr. Aitchison, so I am informed, was heartily in sympathy with the voluntary reduction in rates on lumber shipped from the West. They had pending what was called the hardwood case. Mr. Aitchison opposed a reduction in that case. It was understood, and the railroad executives, so I am informed, had stated, that if the hardwood case resulted in a reduction they would make a similar reduction in rates on lumber from the southern territory. Mr. Aitchison opposed that, and I am told opposed even the idea of their making a voluntary reduction in the rates on yellow pine shipped from the South.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall look into the situation, because the Senator has made a very grave charge against Mr. Aitchison. I know Mr. Aitchison very well, and have known him for many years. I look upon him as one of the most intelligent as well as honorable men in public life, and unless the Senator has some record before him, or some evidence, that he has been influenced in his action by the locality from which he comes, I hardly credit the information upon which the Senator is acting, because there is no higher-minded man in this country than Mr. Aitchison.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know Mr. Aitchison, but I had these circumstances and facts related to me by a gentleman connected with the lumber industry of the South, and until Mr. Aitchison displays some interest in getting a reduction in freight rates upon lumber shipped from southern territory, so that the business of that section of the country will not be paralyzed by the existing high rates and the reduction granted the lumbermen of the West, which makes the southern men unable to compete or even meet the prices of the western lumbermen in the eastern market, I will share the view of my informant that Mr. Aitchison's viewpoint is entirely a western viewpoint, that he is willing to discriminate in favor of the West against the lumbermen of the South. What I demand on the part of my section of the country at the hands of Mr. Aitchison or any other member of the commission is that they do justice by the industries of the southern part of this Republic, even though they may not hail from that part of the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. It may be that the Senator has answered what is in my mind, but I did not so understand it. He has stated what Mr. Aitchison's position was when this controversy, or case, was before the commission. Of course, every fair-minded man realizes that all these rates should be equitable as among the several sections of the country, but what I desired to ask the Senator was what the final action of the commission was with regard to these lumber rates; or has the case not yet been disposed of?

Mr. TRAMMELL. They have not disposed of what they call the hardwood case. The other matters were handled in an informal way, as a good many matters have been handled by that commission. During the last three or four months we have seen the railroads of the country facing a threatening cloud—the possibility of a forced reduction in freight rates. We have witnessed them coming in and voluntarily proposing some reduction of rates. That was the policy pursued in this instance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I feel certain that the Senator from Florida has done Commissioner Aitchison an injustice. For many years he was chairman of the Oregon State Railway Commission. In that capacity he always showed a broadness of vision and a spirit of justice that did not permit of discrimination toward any part of the State. Since he has been a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission I am sure no one can say justly, however strong a desire they may have to have a commissioner from their own section of the country, that Mr. Aitchison ever has done any single thing in his career as commissioner that would invite the suggestion or justify the suggestoin that he has been discriminatory, unfair, or unjust.

The Senator from Florida speaks of the white-pine rates to the coast. He must know that western pine, the Douglas fir, is raised along the coast mountains. The railroads there come into competition with water carriers, and therefore there has always been a lowering of the rates to those sections of the country from which all this timber moves. Naturally the commission has taken that into consideration and has given rates to the coast which were lower than the rates given to towns and cities in either mountain district of the country, which involves the question of the long-and-short haul.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senator from Florida further, but I know Mr. Aitchison, his career and his ability, so well that I wish to say that I believe it is unfair for anyone to charge that he has not acted fairly and justly toward all sections of the country.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has stated that the rates from the West are low because of water competition. I am sure the Senator is sufficiently familiar with his geography to know that Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and a number of the lumber-producing States in the South are also coast States and that they should participate in whatever competition we may have on account of water rates. They are not doing so, however. They are not doing so because the Interstate Commerce Commission has not shown that zealousy toward them and in behalf of getting a reduction of lumber rates from the South that has been true as to the fixing of railroad rates from the West.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator says he is informed. Is there a record of that character showing that Mr. Aitchison has attempted to decide the policy of the Interstate Commerce Commission as against the South and in favor of the West?

Mr. TRAMMELL. My informant is a man connected with the industry and has more or less business before the Interstate Commerce Commission and is pretty well in touch with what is going on and the position of Mr. Aitchison with regard to this matter.

The best way for Mr. Aitchison to reestablish himself in my confidence is to see that justice is done to the lumber industry in the southern part of the country. If he will do that he will reestablish himself in my confidence; otherwise he will not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I held up these appointments before the holidays as a protest that the great southern territory had been absolutely ignored not only by President Harding but by President Wilson. When President Wilson sent two names down here for confirmation for appointment on the Interstate Commerce Commission and did not recognize the South I held them up and made two vacancies, which President Harding filled after Wilson went out. I did the same thing with these appointments simply as a matter of protest.

I know of no reason why Mr. Aitchison should not be confirmed, but if what the Senator from Florida says is true he ought not to be confirmed, and I think it ought to be known. I have the highest regard for Mr. Aitchison and have nothing against him at all. I am surprised to hear these revelations here to-day. I do not think such charges ought to be made unless there is some truth behind them, because this is an outrageous thing against the South.

But here is New Jersey with two men on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and while this great territory in the South always had a representative upon the commission up to the time Woodrow Wilson became President, a representative in the person of Judge Clements, who was one of the ablest men on the commission, we have no such representative now. Judge Clements represented the southern territory for a long time. All we want is some one on the commission who represents the South.

I heard the other day, though I do not know whether it is true or not, that the question of freight rates on cotton came up before the commission, and the question of lint cotton was being discussed, and it developed that there was not a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who knew what lint cotton meant. That would seem to demonstrate why somebody ought to be on the commission from this great classification territory, somebody who understands our conditions, who understands what we raise, and who would, for instance, know what lint cotton is.

It was for reasons of that character that I held up the appointments simply as a protest. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is rendering a great service. If what he has said is true, it ought to be known. I do not know anything about it, but if the charges are true, Mr. Aitchison ought not to be confirmed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to my colleague, who rose first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York desires to state a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it within the power or discretion of a Senator holding the floor to yield for speeches to be made by other Senators?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will yield to my colleague only for an inquiry, because I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask my colleague this question, whether or not it is true that what is known as the hardwood case—that is, a complaint filed in a case made up with respect to freight rates on hardwood from southern territory to the North and the East—has been pending for some time, some months, and whether or not that case is still undecided and undetermined, and whether or not the railroads have signified that if that case be decided in favor of the shipper—that is, in favor of a reduction of the rates on hardwood—they would then voluntarily make similar reductions as to yellow pine and all other timber from the South to those markets, and therefore, whether it is not true that the whole question of adjusting the rates and putting them upon a fair basis from the South to northern and eastern markets, on both hardwood and yellow pine and all other lumber, is dependent on the decision of the hardwood case, and whether the Senator's information as to that case is that the position of Mr. Aitchison is one of opposition to any reduction being made?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is my information, that he is opposed to any reduction being made in that particular case. It is commonly known in railroad circles and by people who are interested in the lumber industry and by the railroad traffic departments, that if that case is determined in favor of the shippers a similar reduction will be made upon yellow pine from southern territory. I understand Mr. Aitchison is opposed to any reduction being made. A few days ago, so I am informed, with nine members of the commission present, with five members probably against reducing the rates on hardwood from southern territory, Mr. Aitchison, who was against the rate reduction, attempted to force a decision in this case. Had he done so, it would have meant the defeat, for the present at least, of the yellow-pine lumbermen from the southern territory in their effort to get a reduction which would enable them to compete with the Northwest in the eastern markets.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon what, yellow pine or hardwood?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Hardwood from southern territory.

Mr. CUMMINS. The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] indicates that the case pending relates to freight rates upon hardwood. Of course, there is no competition between the West and the South on hardwood. For years now there has been a certain relation between freight rates from the western part of the country to the markets in the East on soft woods, pine of various kinds, and the freight rates from southern territory to the markets in the Middle West and the East. For years the southern country has had altogether the advantage, as it ought to have an advantage, in freight rates to the country in which I live.

I would like to know whether there is any charge that the relation between the competing lumbers from the West and from the South has been changed? I have not heard that the relation has been changed at all, although it may have been. I am not familiar at all with the case.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not familiar with the details.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me it is very far-fetched to charge that because Mr. Aitchison may be—I do not know that he is—opposed to a reduction in the rates on hardwood from the South, that therefore he is doing the South an injustice. I do not know. I think one ought to be pretty careful with respect to his facts before he makes a charge that an officer holding the position Mr. Aitchison does is consciously influenced because of the interest he may have in the locality from which he comes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not familiar with the details of that case, but on account of the assurance of the railroads that they would reduce the yellow-pine rates in an amount equal to any reduction that might be made upon hardwood from southern territory, and the two questions being so interwoven one with the other, it seems to me that opposition to reduction of the hardwood rates of course would involve the question of the rates upon yellow pine.

I do not wish to do Mr. Aitchison an injustice, but I understand that he is also opposed to a reduction in the yellow-pine rates from the South. Whether that inference has been drawn entirely from his position on the hardwood case I will not state. It might be that is true. However, I got the contrary impression that he had probably expressly made known that he was opposed to the reduction in the rates on yellow pine from southern territory. That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I only wish to remark that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has well covered the points involved in that case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall have to make the point of order that the Senator from Florida loses the floor if he permits another Senator to make a speech while he has the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not wish to yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to conclude briefly. In framing the bill designating the territory from which members respectively should be appointed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, I do not contend that I have properly apportioned the territory just as it should be apportioned. My object and purpose is to emphasize the fact that there should be a diversity of residence in the membership of the commission and that it should not be centralized in any one particular section or in any one or two or three particular sections of the United States.

As was well stated by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. CUMMINS], in speaking of certain members of the commission, their viewpoint probably is fixed very largely by their knowledge and their familiarity with the problems in the particular localities from which they come. I think the commission itself recognizes that that is true, because the commission, as I understand, designates certain members of the commission to have more direct supervision, I might say, over the questions coming from particular sections of the country, and in the selection of those members to supervise more particularly certain problems they do not select members from a section of the country entirely removed from that in which the particular problems arise, but they assign to those problems more generally members from that particular locality or that section.

If that is true it emphasizes the necessity of the great southern part of the country having representation upon the commission. I care nothing particularly about the personnel of the commission. I care nothing about who may be appointed from the southern part of the country. Had the great southern territory been properly considered, had it received the same treatment in the question of rates at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission that other sections of the country have, then there would be no necessity and no reason for having introduced the bill or for the position that I am advocating at the present time.

We have some precedents for the policy of requiring the appointment of members of boards from different geographical sections of the country so as to make a proper distribution of such appointments. In the present law governing the appointment of members of the Shipping Board what do we find? We find the following provision in section 3 of the present law:

> The commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed on them by this act, and two shall be appointed from the States touching on the Pacific Ocean—

I fancy that somebody representing the western part of the country at the time that this law was being prepared felt that the great Pacific coast should have representation upon this important board; and I think they were right about it. The act further provides—> two from the States touching the Atlantic Ocean, one from the States touching the Gulf of Mexico, one from the States touching the Great Lakes, and one from the interior, but not more than one shall be appointed from the same State.

That is the policy precisely which I seek to have enacted into the law governing the Interstate Commerce Commission, so as to provide for the distribution of these important offices among the different sections of the country.

Of course, I do not know what reason the Interstate Commerce Commission may give for having prior to the present railroad control act fixed rates that permitted, as an illustration, the citrus-fruit producers of California to ship their fruit from the West, a distance of approximately 3,000 miles, to the eastern market for a rate of not more than 12 or 15 cents per box than was charged for the transportation of the citrus fruits of Florida to the eastern markets, a distance ranging from 800 to 1,000 or 1,200 miles.

Take the rates which the commission authorized—for they had their approval—following the authority granted by Congress in the Esch-Cummins Act of 1920 to increase rates, and it will be found that they prescribed rates of only about 16 cents per box more for citrous fruits coming from California to New York than they did from the Florida territory for the transportation of a box of oranges to the eastern market. They prescribed rates to Chicago and other points in the Middle West, a distance of practically twice what it was from Florida to New York, for the transportation of citrous fruit approximating the same as the rate prescribed from Florida for only about one-half the haul.

Untrained in the mysteries of transportation rates and not claiming to be an expert on freight schedules, I am unable to understand this discrepancy; yet I know that it is a condition with which the people in my State who are engaged in the citrus-fruit industry have had to contend for years. We can do no worse by getting a change and having the Interstate Commerce Commissioners appointed from different sections of the country.

I have introduced this bill. As I have stated, if a majority of the Senate agrees with me as to the general policy, the bill will probably have to be changed so far as the designation of territory is concerned. What I am interested in, and interested in primarily, is the matter of having the different geographical sections of the country represented on the commission, having justice done by every part of this great Nation of ours in dealing with the transportation problem, and I am seriously interested in having the great southern part of America, which today has no representation upon the commission, represented in its membership.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked me if it were true that all of the grain which has been purchased for Russian relief was to be shipped in foreign vessels, he having heard that such an order had been issued by the Shipping Board. I at once got in touch with Mr. Lasker, the head of the board, and asked him what were the facts in the case. What I shall now say is substantially a repetition of the statement which he made to me in reference to that matter.

Under the so-called Jones Act it is the duty of the Shipping Board to encourage private shipping as much as it is possible to do so. The object of the law is that the Government of the United States shall not come in direct competition with ships which are operated under the American flag and which are owned by private parties. Mr. Lasker has tried to follow out that policy.

The Shipping Board to-day are operating vessels only on established routes and running upon schedule time; the remainder of the ships which are under the control of the Shipping Board or of the Government are tied up. The question of the manner of shipping grain to Russia for the relief of that unhappy people came up immediately after the passage of the joint resolution appropriating $20,000,000 for the purchase of supplies in aid of the Russian people. It was impossible to utilize the vessels which are in operation on regular routes. The only alternative the Shipping Board had was to employ some of the ships which are now tied up and repair them, as, indeed, all of them would have to be repaired, and secure crews to operate them, or else allow American tramp vessels, not running on any particular course but flying the American flag, to transport the grain to Russia. The rates which were offered Mr. Hoover for the shipment of the first cargo were such that there would have been a heavy loss of money if the Government of the United States had taken one of the Government-owned vessels now tied up, repaired it, placed it in operation, and shipped the grain by such vessel. Therefore, Mr. President, Mr. Lasker, the head of the Shipping Board, is following out the law as it is.

He also stated to me that he had notified Mr. Hoover that if vessels operated by American citizens and flying the American flag could not be secured rapidly enough to transport the grain to Russia, then the board would take some of the Government-owned vessels which are tied up, repair them, and transport the grain in that way.

That is the exact situation as it exists to-day. I thought that, after the inquiry had been made, it was my duty to state to the Senate just exactly the situation. I think Mr. Lasker has done all that could be done, acting in conformity with the provisions of the law which has already been passed.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. CURTIS. Is not the Senate now proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not spoken for five minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know how long the Senator has spoken; I merely ask the question, because I am anxious to hurry these matters along, if it is possible to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question in connection with the matter which he has just been discussing. I do not quite understand whether the matter has been determined one way or the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Not as yet; nor can it be until the occasion arises to determine just exactly what they are going to do, except that, if the rates on privately owned vessels are sufficiently low to make it inadvisable to repair and utilize the Government ships that are now tied up, privately owned vessels will be employed for the purpose of transporting the grain.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Shipping Board will find that there is not any very great need of extensive repairs; that many of the Shipping Board vessels which are now tied up are in perfect repair and condition. They may need to be cleaned up a little or something of that sort, but that is a matter of very little consequence and involves very little expense. Then, so far as manning the vessels is concerned, I think there are some 30,000 sailors now out of employment who would like to get on board some of these ships. Furthermore, out of some 1,100 cargo carriers belonging to or under the control of the Shipping Board, only about 380 are in operation, as I recall. We certainly have enough ships of first class and in good condition ready to perform this service.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows very well the conditions under which the board must operate, for, I think, he supported the bill by the terms of which privately owned ships, flying the American flag, were to be encouraged as much as possible, and the Government was not to enter into direct competition in the regular carrying trade. I have no doubt that the grain for Russia can be carried——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I will have to insist upon the rule. I do so because we have been in session for an hour and a half and have done nothing as yet except to discuss matters that are not before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will conclude in a moment. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I have not any doubt that if privately owned vessels can not be secured at such rates that the expense involved will be less than that incident to organizing new crews to man vessels which are now tied under the control of the Shipping Board and repairing and conditioning such vessels, Mr. Lasker will use the Government-owned vessels in order to make sure that the grain is transported.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that that bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) imposing a duty of 90 per cent on all goods exported from the United States for the use of the American Expeditionary Forces and its allied forces and which have been sold to any foreign Government or person when reimported into the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2515) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 268) for the relief of William O. Mallahan was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MILITARY SERVICE OUTSIDE OF CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 2363) to abolish the limitation on military service without the continental limits of the United States imposed by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York what the effect of the bill will be?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If enacted, it will save the Government $300,000 a year.

Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. The amendment will not change the intent of the measure in the least, but will better express its meaning, I think.

On line 4, page 1, I move to strike out the words "is hereby repealed," and to insert the same words on line 12 after the words "Philippine Scouts."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to this bill, because he asked me, if it came up, to request that it be passed over. It is Order of Business No. 295.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I recall the bill. I told the Senator from New York that if it came up again, as it has come up two or three times, I would not object to its consideration. I am constrained not to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments offered by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "is hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 12, after the word "Scouts," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "is hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether this bill extends the period of service, or limits the period of service, or imposes any restriction upon the officials of the War Department in determining the place where the enlisted men shall serve or the length of time that they shall serve in any particular locality?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does away with all restrictions.

Mr. KING. It does not extend the period of service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no. It leaves it in the discretion of the department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to see what those amendments mean. I should like to have the bill read now with the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as amended.

The READING CLERK. As amended, the bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of the act of March 4, 1915, which reads as follows: "Provided further, That on and after October 1, 1915, no officer or enlisted man of the Army shall, except upon his own request, be required to serve in a single tour of duty more than two years in the Philippine Islands, nor more than three years in the Panama Canal Zone, except in case of insurrection or of actual or threatened hostilities: Provided further, That the foregoing provision shall not apply to the organization known as the Philippine Scouts," is hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the object of that simply to repeal the provision applying to the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To repeal the whole thing. Those two provisions which are in quotation marks are part of the act of March 4, 1915. As the bill was introduced and reported from the committee the words "is hereby repealed" occur on line 4, before the quotation from the act which is to be repealed; and it was a rather awkward way of expressing it. I thought the conclusion of the bill should be the repealing clause.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is right. All I wanted to know was whether the repealing clause applied only to the organization known as the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It applies to everything within the quotation marks. It says:

That the proviso of the act of March 4, 1915, which reads as follows—

Then there are certain words in quotation marks—is hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. But the words "is hereby repealed" are to follow the proviso which reads:

Provided further, That the foregoing provision shall not apply to the organization known as the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but that is immaterial. The whole thing is repealed—the whole limitation upon the officers.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt very much whether it is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator that the bill as at present amended reads as follows:

That the proviso of the act of March 4, 1915, which reads as follows—

Then follow the two provisos and then the words "is hereby repealed."

That repeals them both. We might say, "The provisos are hereby repealed." It is the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. As long as you keep it in quotation marks, perhaps it will do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The provisos are in quotation marks, qualified and described by the words "which reads as follows."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the purpose, as I understand, is to repeal a proviso of an existing law, or rather, two provisos—a proviso within a proviso.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. It would seem that perhaps if you repeal that which is in quotations, and the quotation consists of the proviso which you seek to repeal, you effectuate the object. I think it is all right, though it is a little awkward.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if you keep it within the quotation marks, perhaps it will be all right. The way it is, it is really awkward, in my opinion, but it is very much better than the bill as reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be reported, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, for the RECORD, that the War Department estimates that the passage of this bill will result in a saving to the Treasury of $305,000 annually.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question. There is a period after the word "Scouts"——

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; we have inserted a comma there.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been done?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A comma is inserted after "Scouts," and the period is advanced and put after the word "repealed."

Mr. SMOOT. Then, there is a colon after "hostilities." Does the Senator think the words "is hereby repealed" can go back of the last proviso? What I am afraid of is that that repeals only the last proviso of the law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, to settle the matter, I will offer two more amendments. I am perfectly positive that the bill is all right as it is, but there can be no doubt about what I shall suggest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 3, I move to change the word "proviso" to "provisos."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 12, I move to strike out the word "is" and substitute the word "are."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 3, I move to strike out the "s" of the word "reads."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So that the bill now will read:

That the provisos of the act of March 4, 1915, which read as follows—

Then the provisos are quoted—are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2035) for the relief of William M. Carroll was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 150) directing the Secretary of the Senate to employ a special officer for the office of the Secretary of the Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

PUNISHMENT OF ASSAULTS ON MAIL CARRIERS.

The bill (S. 2573) to amend section 198 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to one point. I think Congress is going wild in legislating——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator hear me for just a minute? I think he misapprehends the bill.

Mr. KING. I ask that this may not be taken out of my five minutes.

Mr. NELSON. Most of the bill is existing law. If the Senator will turn to the bill he will find that everything down to and including the word "receptacle," on line 5 of the second page, is existing law. The existing law provides for the punishment of anyone who—

Shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle.

The only amendment that is proposed here is to provide that anyone who makes an assault upon a mail carrier while he is engaged in the performance of his duty shall be punished.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that, Mr. President. As an original proposition, I am opposed to the whole thing. I think this is a scheme to project the Federal Government into the States. It is following the Neagle decision, with which the Senator is familiar, where a deputy marshal, under habeas corpus proceedings, was released from custody for having killed an individual. It was alleged that he was guarding Mr. Justice Field, and that because he was acting for the Federal Government and committed a homicide the State law was not applicable, and the strong arm of the Federal Government was interposed to arrest the prosecution by the State. The States have laws to punish assaults and batteries, as well as malicious mischief; and I think it is a wrong thing for the Federal Government to be enacting these penal codes to deal with matters which are covered by the laws of the States. I think it is improper.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to some other statutes. I have not got them here.

Mr. KING. Oh, we have a multitude of them. We are having the Federal Government projected into the States and enacting penal statutes duplicating the statutes enacted by the States.

Mr. NELSON. No; these are old statutes to which I refer. They are statutes under which, if an assault or an attack is made upon a Federal officer in the performance of his duty, and he is prosecuted in the State courts, his case can be taken to the Federal courts. Statutes of that kind have long been in existence. They existed long before the war and before the spirit of socialism was invoked.

I recall a case in Virginia, to which I referred in my remarks on the prohibition bill. That was a case where a prohibition officer was engaged in enforcing the law. He arrested men, caught them with liquor, and there was shooting. He was indicted in the State courts, and the case was transferred, under an old statute, to the Federal courts, and I have no doubt that under that statute a case of this kind could be transferred to the Federal courts, independent of this proposed statute.

Mr. KING. Then it is not needed.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator to this remarkable thing. Under a Federal statute we punish a man who breaks open a mail box, who steals mail, who takes it on a mail-carrier route, and yet if the man who does that goes a step further and assaults and disables the rural carrier while he is engaged in the performance of his duty we do not provide any punishment for his assault. We punish for the act of breaking open or destroying the box which farmers place on the line; we punish a man for stealing the mail, yet when the man is engaged in the performance of his duty and is assaulted on his route in the midst of his duties we refuse to punish his assailant. We are now proceeding under Rule VIII, and if the Senator insists on his objection, I shall not attempt to discuss it further now.

Mr. KING. I should like to discuss it at greater length.

Mr. NELSON. I think human life is entitled to as much protection as a mere letter box.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that human life is protected under the laws of the States. I object.

Mr. NELSON. As the Senator objects, there is no use carrying on the debate any longer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the bill goes over.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

The bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INITIATION OF PENSION AND CLAIMS LEGISLATION.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1) providing that legislation dealing with pensions, private claims, distribution of war trophies, etc., be initiated by petition on suitable furnished forms, was announced as next in order.

The concurrent resolution had been reported from the Committee on Rules, with amendments, on page 1, line 2, before the word "pensions," to insert the word "private"; in line 3 after the word "claims" and the comma, to insert the word "and"; and in line 5, to strike out the words "and with matters not of a public nature," so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That legislation dealing with private pensions, either original or increases, with private claims, and with the distribution of war trophies to municipalities or organizations, shall hereafter be initiated by petition upon suitable forms provided for that purpose, which petition shall be referred to its appropriate committee without printing other than by title in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that any bill resulting therefrom shall be printed only when reported favorably by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the purpose of this concurrent resolution seems to be to materially change the procedure of Congress respecting the classes of legislation defined in the resolution. I think I am in sympathy with the purpose, if I understand just what it is. The feature of the resolution which raises a doubt in my mind is the clause "shall hereafter be initiated by petition upon special forms provided for that purpose." I would like to have some Senator who has studied the resolution define just what the procedure will be if it is passed and if the changes it proposes are effected.

Mr. SMOOT. The only change will be that instead of introducing a private pension bill a Senator will present a petition, with all the papers, which will go to the committee; the committee will act upon it, and when it is reported favorably it will be printed. Some five years ago I had collected the private bills which had been introduced in every Congress for 30 years, all of which had been printed, and upon which no action had ever been taken. They were printed not with the hope of ever having them acted upon but simply to send copies home or to distribute them to those who were really interested in the proposed legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand it, Mr. President, if this resolution is passed Senators and Representatives will no longer be authorized to introduce bills relating to private claims or pensions. They will merely present petitions, which will be referred to the committees having jurisdiction of the subject matter, and if the committee to which a petition is referred sees fit to act a bill will be reported, and if not there will be no way of bringing the matter before the Senate or the House of Representatives for action. We all know that a great many bills are presented, relating both to private claims and private pensions, on which no action is ever taken. We also know that unless some Senator presses for action upon a bill of this character there is not the slightest possibility of a claim or a pension ever being determined. I very much fear this procedure, and I shall ask that the resolution may go over in order that fuller discussion of it may be had.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator, before it goes over, that I am quite sure it will save the Government at least $50,000. I do not think it covers any bills at all which really are of any moment, because wherever there was a chance to act upon a pension bill I think in the past it has been acted upon.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is proposing to change that procedure. That is an argument for a continuance of the existing process and not an argument for the changed procedure the resolution contemplates.

Mr. SMOOT. A bill would be introduced just the same, with whatever petitions there may be, and it would be referred to the committee exactly the same as it is to-day; but it would not be printed in the quantities the law requires. It would not be printed so that every one of those bills would be sent to every depository library in the United States. It would not be printed so that it would be sent to the head of every department of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I understand the Senator correctly, that is very different from his first statement. His first statement was that no longer would private claim bills or private pension bills be introduced; that the claim would be initiated by petition, the petition would be referred, and unless the committee saw fit to report a bill there would be no bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There would be no bill printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand; the object is to avoid the printing of these private bills.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that would be the effect of the resolution. The last clause reads:

And that any bill resulting therefrom shall be printed only when reported favorably by the committee.

That is a provision that unless the committee reports the bill it shall not be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the first provision is that it must be initiated by petition. Just what does that mean? Does it mean that a Senator can not introduce a private claim bill unless at the same time he presents a petition for its introduction; or does it mean that he does not present a bill at all, but presents a petition, which is referred to the committee? I think the latter construction is the correct one, and it had better go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will go over.

BUSINESS PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 172) declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 748) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles F. Getchell, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ORIN THORNTON.

The bill (S. 1655) for the relief of Orin Thornton, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure the Senator from Utah has forgotten. This bill went over, and he and I discussed it and he told me he had no further objection to it.

Mr. KING. I am glad the Senator reminded me. He made an explanation. It had escaped my mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, if it has escaped the Senator's memory, I do not care to press it. Let it go over this time.

Mr. KING. I shall be obliged if the Senator will allow it to go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 486) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, to strike out on page 3, lines 24 and 25, and on page 4 down to and including the word "law" on line 5, as follows:

That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition of withdrawn or classified coal lands or lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, commonly known as soldiers' homestead law.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition, under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or under acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, of withdrawn or classified coal, oil, or gas lands or of lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act homestead claims may be initiated by actual settlers for public lands of the United States in Alaska known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, and which are not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, whenever such claim shall be initiated with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the coal, oil, or gas in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same; and any settler who has initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, or gas, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which the claim was initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act: Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

SEC. 2. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the entry is made and of this act the entryman shall be entitled to a patent to the lands entered by him, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal, oil, or gas in the land so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal, oil, or gas deposits so reserved shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the laws applicable to coal, oil, or gas deposits on coal, oil, or gas lands in Alaska in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to acquire coal, oil, or gas deposits, or the right to mine and remove the coal or to drill for and remove the oil or gas under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by the provisions of this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal, oil, or gas therein, upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal, oil, or gas deposits in any such land, or the right to mine, drill for, or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the coal, oil, or gas therefrom, and mine and remove the coal or drill for and remove the oil or gas upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That the owner under such limited patent shall have the right to mine the coal for use on the land for domestic purposes at any time prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the exploration upon or entry of any coal deposits withdrawn from such exploration and purchase: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition, under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or under acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, of withdrawn or classified coal, oil, or gas lands or of lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOUNT M'KINLEY NATIONAL PARK, ALASKA.

The bill (H. R. 6262) to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the general purpose of this bill, but I desire to prepare an amendment so that under certain conditions and restrictions mineral exploration may be permitted. As the law now reads, lands that are withdrawn and attached to national parks may not be prospected under any condition for minerals, and this land, according to the information which I have, might be prospected without any interference with the scenic beauties or the legitimate purposes for which the national park was organized. If my colleague will let the bill go over, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I express the hope that the Senator will prepare his amendment so that when we reach the bill on the calendar when it is next called we can act upon it.

Mr. KING. I will prepare it and submit it to the Secretary of the Interior, to see if we can not work out something that will be satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. The General Land Office is now engaged in marking out the boundaries of the park. The Senator knows the conditions in Alaska. The men are there already to do the work, and if this is not accomplished and the whole survey made by the latter part of June it will have to go over again.

Mr. KING. I know my colleague and I entertain the same views as to the right to mine, if it can be done without interfering with the legitimate purposes of the park, and I am sure that the officials of the Interior Department, with such little aid as I may give, can work out a plan that will be satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a department bill. It was sent to me to be introduced, and, of course, the department makes a favorable report upon it. There was a favorable report made upon it once before. It is a House bill, and passed the House without any opposition whatever.

Mr. KING. I shall call the attention of the department to it immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. KING. Until it is completed?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent, and I think I would rather have a better attendance before I do so. So I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	King	Smoot
Borah	Fernald	McCumber	Spencer
Brandegee	Fletcher	McNary	Stanfield
Broussard	France	Nelson	Sterling
Bursum	Glass	New	Sutherland
Calder	Gooding	Norbeck	Swanson
Cameron	Harris	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Heflin	Page	Wadsworth
Culberson	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
Dial	Kenyon	Sheppard	Williams
Edge	Keyes	Simmons	Willis

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily detained.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, one of the most important questions to the American public that this body will be called upon to decide is the one now before us affecting the purity of elections and the integrity of the Senate. There was a unanimous-consent agreement entered into limiting the debate to one hour in the Newberry case, beginning, I believe, to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HARRISON. One hour on the proposition or of any amendment pending or motion that might be offered.

Mr. CURTIS. No; I think the Senator is mistaken. If he will read the unanimous-consent agreement, he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. KING. The one-hour limitation begins on Monday next.

Mr. HARRISON. Starting on Monday?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that it was to be the fourth calendar day after we reconvened after the Christmas holidays.

Mr. CURTIS. There are to be two days of general debate, commencing to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. It is rumored, and very reliably so, that Senator NEWBERRY contemplates speaking in this contested case and that in all probability he will speak Monday. In view of the unanimous-consent agreement and the limit imposed on that discussion, I wish to ask a modification of the agreement.

I am quite sure that no Senator would desire to limit another Senator in the defense of a question so important to him and to the Senate. If he explains all the matters and things that have been charged against him and clarifies the record, it would take considerable time, much more than an hour. I could not conceive of a Senator who might discuss this case in his own behalf who would even attempt to speak to the Senate without giving full opportunity to be questioned by his colleagues.

I make that suggestion, because I have not the slightest idea that the Senator from Michigan might take his place in the Senate and, under the limitation of one hour of debate, deliver his speech without giving his colleagues, especially the members of the committee which made this investigation, an opportunity to question him touching matters about which they might have some doubt. If he desires time to discuss it fully, it should be given to him. I can not imagine that a Republican Senator would object to that, and certainly none on this side of the Chamber would object to it. The limitation should be removed, then, so far as Senator NEWBERRY is concerned and no limitation of time should apply to his speech. If he wants a day or two days or a week to discuss it and subject himself to questions by his colleagues, he should have it.

Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement be modified so that it will not apply to Senator NEWBERRY should he take his place and speak on this matter.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I object to any modification of the unanimous-consent agreement for the reason principally that the Senator from Mississippi is mistaken as to what the present unanimous-consent agreement contemplates. The present unanimous-consent agreement provides that commencing upon the fourth calendar day upon which the Senate is in session after the Christmas holidays, which the Senator could easily compute, means 1 o'clock to-morrow, Friday, the so-called Ford-Newberry contest shall be taken up by the Senate to the exclusion of all other business except the morning business and any other business that the Senate may unanimously desire to consider, and for the next two calendar days upon which the Senate shall be in session it shall proceed without any limitation upon the debate. So in case the junior Senator from Michigan should speak and desires to speak longer than an hour, he would be given ample opportunity. Therefore, there is no necessity for any change in the present unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. But that applies to Friday and Saturday, and the rumor is, and I inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether he has not heard it, that Senator NEWBERRY expects to be here Monday and speak.

Mr. SPENCER. I had not heard that he expected to be here Monday and speak in his own defense, but I have heard, as the Senator from Mississippi has indicated, that there is quite a probability that the junior Senator from Michigan may appear before the Senate and make his statement. If that should occur on Monday, there would still be ample time without limitation until 12 o'clock on Monday, provided that we have a session on Saturday. But it is usual in the first week after the Christmas holidays, and I am assuming the practice will be followed, for the Senate on Friday afternoon to adjourn over until Monday, which would make the unlimited time for debate run until 12 o'clock on Tuesday. The Senator will see, therefore, that there is no reason why we should now change the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. There is reason if he does not speak until the 1-hour limitation begins to apply, and it is to remove that limitation, when the rule applies limiting debate to one hour, that I have asked for a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SPENCER. I know with what excellent motive the Senator from Mississppi is moved and how anxious he is that there should be full discussion. It might perhaps occur to some that the suggestion should come from the friends of Senator NEWBERRY, but doubtless that had not occurred to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. We are more generous than the Senator supposed. We were afraid perhaps that it would not come from the friends of Senator NEWBERRY.

Mr. SPENCER. Perhaps that is true. Coming, therefore, from those who are not the friends of Senator NEWBERRY, let the Senator from Mississippi draw his own inference, but certainly there is no need of any change in the present agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senator from Missouri that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] gave notice that he would address the Senate on Saturday. So in deference to the senior Senator from Michigan it will be necessary to hold a session on Saturday.

Mr. SPENCER. I remember the notice which the senior Senator from Michigan gave.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri has the floor, he having risen to object to the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SPENCER. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Then I yield to the Senator from Ohio, who first addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his objection?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator from Missouri for yielding to me, but as the Senator questions the propriety of the suggestion coming from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], intimating that a request for unanimous consent to give more time to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] would come with greater propriety from the other side of the Chamber, it occurred to me that as the friends of the sitting Member, including his very good friend, the Senator from Missouri, refused to permit him to speak before the committee, naturally the Senator from Mississippi might come to the conclusion that they would forget to ask him to come before the Senate to speak.

Mr. SPENCER. Perhaps that is the reason which influenced the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. President, I have just been told by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that when I thought I did not have the floor I was quite willing to yield to him, but when the Chair decided that I did have the floor I yielded to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] instead. Now, if the Chair permits, I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Chair permit that to be done? The Senator from Missouri has a string to his yielding even yet, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi and to the Senator from Missouri. Certainly there will be no objection to this proposition. Personally I should not like to see this question again opened up to unlimited debate; I think the unanimous-consent agreement is very liberal, but I would not desire the limitation to apply to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] if he shall wish to speak. Therefore I submit the request that the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore agreed to be modified as follows:

That such limitation on debate shall not apply to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] if he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. That was exactly the request that I made. That is perfectly agreeable to me. I do not want to open up this subject to unlimited debate to all Senators, but only desire that the limitation shall be waived as against the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how anyone could object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPENCER. I object to the request for precisely the same reason which I have previously indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand, the Senator from Missouri has objected to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SPENCER. I have objected.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that there are some Senators on this side of the Chamber who are very much interested in the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] having full opportunity to state his case; but, so far as I am concerned, I shall not be in favor of an arrangement which will permit that Senator to stand here and read a speech and not respond to inquiries. I therefore think the Senator from Missouri ought not to object to the perfectly reasonable request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as objection has been made, I wish to make an inquiry concerning another feature of the matter. As I understand, the time at which the debate is to begin is to-morrow at 1 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that to be the case.

Mr. BORAH. I had understood—and I am sure it was intimated about the Senate Chamber that there was such an understanding, although I do not know that it was authentic—that, owing to the fact that we adjourned almost immediately on the first day of the session on account of the death of the late Senator Penrose, it was understood that the unanimous-consent agreement should begin to operate on Saturday, and that it was for that reason the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] gave notice that he would open the debate on that day. I should like to know if it is now definitely determined that debate shall open to-morrow at 1 o'clock under the agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Ohio that that is the unanimous-consent agreement, and there has been no modification of it in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, provided the Senate is in session to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senate should not be in session to-morrow, the debate would begin on the following day when the Senate convenes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement reads as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that at 1 o'clock p. m. on the fourth calendar day upon which the Senate shall be in session after January 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan, etc.

That agreement has not been modified by the Senate, and if the Senate should be in session to-morrow it would take effect——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I had the same impression as that which has just been expressed by the Senator from Idaho, that, owing to the death of the late Senator Penrose, the Senate having merely met and immediately adjourned after the announcement of that event, that day would not be included as one of the calendar days.

Mr. KENYON. Why is it not a calendar day?

Mr. KING. I supposed that day would not be included.

Mr. BORAH. Technically, of course, it is a calendar day, and if that is the construction which is placed upon the agreement no one can really object, because it was undoubtedly technically a calendar day, notwithstanding the fact that we almost immediately adjourned; but I know there was an understanding of some kind that the debate would not begin until 1 o'clock on Saturday; and I think I can accommodate myself to that situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before this matter is finally concluded I desire to present a parliamentary inquiry. A question has arisen concerning the construction of the last part of the unanimous-consent agreement which reads:

And, further, unless thus disposed of prior to the hour of 12 o'clock m. on the sixth calendar day on which the Senate is in session after January 1, 1922, that from and after such day and hour no Senator shall speak for a longer period than one hour on said Senate resolution 172 or upon any amendment or substitute offered thereto or any motion that may be made in connection therewith.

I desire to inquire whether that is to be interpreted as meaning that a Senator may speak one hour upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], one hour upon the substitute therefor offered by myself, and one hour upon any motion that may be addressed to either of them, or whether the aggregate time allotted each Senator is to be one hour upon whatever matter is before the Senate? The subject had very cursory attention at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into. As will appear from page 8166 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 23, 1921, the proposal as first drafted contemplated that each Senator should be limited to 30 minutes. Referring to that draft the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] said:

I wish to know if the Senate understands that a Senator may speak 30 minutes upon the resolution itself and then 30 minutes upon the resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] or any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. SPENCER. That is the understanding of those who drew the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. That 30 minutes should be allowed upon any amendment.

I presume that would be the proper construction of the agreement, but I should like to have the matter definitely determined, if it can be, at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will say to the Senator from Montana that it was his impression that the intention of the Senate was that no Senator should speak more than an hour in the aggregate; but the Chair is of the opinion that construing the language of the agreement as it has been read it gives a Senator an hour on the resolution, an hour on the substitute, and an hour on any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the interpretation of the Chair is the correct one. Of course only the language of the unanimous-consent agreement can be taken into consideration, technically speaking, in construing it.

MINIDOKA NATIONAL FOREST.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 2914) to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any lands within the following-described areas, found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow, may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be included within and and made a part of the Minidoka National Forest by proclamation of the President, said lands to be thereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests: East half of section 1, east half of section 12, northeast quarter and south half of section 13, sections 24, 25, and 36, township 13 south, range 23 east; section 17, east half of section 18, northeast quarter and south half of section 19, sections 20, 21, south half of section 24, northeast quarter and south half of section 26, south half of section 27, sections 28, 29, 30, and 31, township 12 south, range 24 east, sections 6, 7, 18, 19, 30, and 31, township 13 south, range 24 east; south half of section 19, township 12 south, range 25 east, and west half of section 20, township 13 south, range 25 east, Boise meridian, Idaho: Provided, That the inclusion of any of the aforesaid lands in the Minidoka Forest shall not affect adversely any valid application or entry pending at the date of the approval of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE EMERSON.

The bill (S. 726) for the relief of George Emerson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to have an explanation of the bill from some Senator who is familiar with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] reported the bill. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I notice that the letter of the Secretary of War, printed in connection with the report on the bill, indicates liability and negligence, and shall therefore feel constrained to object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah objects, and the bill will go over.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I should not want it understood that I agree with the policy of the Shipping Board as expressed awhile ago by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

My recollection is that there are some 1,400 steel ships belonging to the Government under the control of the Shipping Board and that there are now in operation about 382 of those ships, leaving in the neighborhood of a thousand or more tied up and idle. It seems to me when the Government appropriates $20,000,000 to send food to Russia that Government-owned vessels could be used. However, from what the senior Senator from Utah has stated, as coming from the chairman of the Shipping Board, it appears that the ships under the control of that board are not in condition to be used. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that it is a very great indictment against the efficiency of the Shipping Board that with hundreds of ships tied up there are not enough which can be put into condition for operation to carry to Russia the grain authorized to be carried by the Congress. It is a very poor advertisement to the world of the condition of those ships.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I am not in sympathy at all with the policy of that board. It is true that under the Jones Act they were to encourage private shipping, but I do not think Congress understood that they were to go so far that the Government ships were to be tied up and remain idle, and allow the cargoes to go to privately owned ships altogether. That, however, seems to be the policy adopted by the present board.

We are losing money; we are losing large sums of money every month; and it does seem to me that the board should become active, and go after cargoes, and try to have those ships kept busy. Instead of that, while it is true that there is not much demand for them, the Government is paying the cost of maintenance and upkeep, and then standing aside and saying to any shipowner who has a cargo in view: "Go ahead and get it, and we will not compete with you." Now, when it comes down to the Government appropriating $20,000,000, we are told that the Shipping Board's vessels can not even carry that corn and those provisions to Russia! Of course, if private ships will carry those provisions over there cheaper than the Government can operate its own ships, it might be good business to let them do so; but to my mind it is an anomalous condition.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to a certain rumor that is going the rounds to-day with reference to the rates on these shipments?

Mr. DIAL. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that the rate to Baltic ports was 22 cents for 100 pounds before Congress specified that the shipments must be made in American bottoms, and that since Congress took that action the owners advanced the rate to 42½ cents. If that is true, it certainly ought to be looked into.

Mr. DIAL. I am not surprised. Here we have something like a thousand steel ships tied up, not operating, not competing for freight, standing back and letting other ships get it. Now, of course, the owners of these other ships are preparing the way to come to Congress and ask for a subsidy. They do not have to ask for it. They have a subsidy already given in letting the Government ships remain idle, and giving them a subsidy, as the Senator states, in advanced freight rates.

Mr. President, the time will soon come, no doubt, when this whole matter will be up before the Senate, and then we shall have a good deal of information that perhaps the Senate does not have and of which the public is also ignorant; but, for one Member, I think that the expenses of the Shipping Board should be cut and the ships should be operated in every practical way.

SHOOTING GROUNDS AND GAME REFUGES.

The bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask that this bill go over. He will say to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] that he is in favor of the bill, but has prepared some slight amendments to it. He left the bill, with those amendments, over on the desk at his office and has not them here. When the bill comes up again the present occupant of the chair will be prepared to permit it to go through.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have no objection to allowing this bill to go over temporarily. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over on the calendar now, with permission to revert to it at a later hour, or with the understanding, at least, that that will be done. The Chair has some amendments he wants to offer, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] wants to make some inquiries about the bill. I think the bill is pretty well understood by most Senators, but I have no disposition to force its immediate consideration; and if that can be the understanding, I shall not at all object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will make no objection to its consideration at any time when he has the bill with his amendments here.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Indiana will not ask for the consideration of the bill to-day. It is a very long bill. It is quite important. It changes certain policies that have heretofore prevailed. I shall not object to its consideration to-morrow or at some later day, but I should like a full opportunity to investigate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the bill so that it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment to the bill which will be printed and lie on the table, and will be considered as pending.

FORT MONROE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (H. R. 7204) to provide a Government-owned water-service system for the Fort Monroe Military Reservation was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAMP HENRY KNOX, KY.

The bill (S. 2072) to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances affecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to execute and deliver a conveyance of title to the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co. to that certain strip of land in the military reservation at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., belonging to the United States of America upon which the line of said railroad was relocated and the new depots and transportation structures were erected at Camp Henry Knox, between the junction points of the old and new locations a distance of approximately 1½ miles, which conveyance when executed and delivered shall convey to the said railroad company all the title to the land so conveyed now vested in the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive on behalf of the United States deed or deeds of conveyance and releases from the mortgage obligations of said railroad company to the old right of way of said company between the points of junction mentioned in the preceding section.

SEC. 3. That the detail description of said conveyances effecting a change of title made necessary by the relocation of said railroad at said point be set forth in said conveyances in accordance with the descriptions contained in a certain contract and agreement between the said Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co., the Illinois Central Railroad Co., and the Director General of Railroads, dated May 23, 1921, which agreement has been formally assented to by the Secretary of War, in which the land to be conveyed to the railroad company is shown in yellow tint on the blue print attached to the said contract, and extending from "C" to "D" thereon, while the land to be conveyed by the railroad company is shown in carmine tint on said blue print and extending from "A" to "B."

SEC. 4. That all laws in conflict herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 4598) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire ——

Mr. McNARY. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee is absent from the Chamber. I should like some explanation concerning this bill. I ask that it be temporarily passed over until he returns to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks that the bill be temporarily passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ARMS AND AMMUNITION SEIZED ALONG MEXICAN BORDER.

The bill (S. 2621) authorizing the President to dispose of certain arms and ammunition seized in pursuance of the act approved June 15, 1917, along the Mexican border, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, through the Secretary of War, to sell, upon such terms as the Secretary of War shall deem expedient, such arms and ammunition now in the hands of the War Department and its bureaus as were seized under the provisions of or in pursuance of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stats., pp. 223–225), and commonly called the "espionage act": Provided, That no such arms and ammunition shall be sold or offered for sale unless the owner thereof is unknown or that such arms and ammunition have remained unclaimed by the owner for a period of one year prior to such offer for sale. The proceeds of such sale, less the expense thereof, if any, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) authorizing the payment of the cost of transportation for certain supplies purchased by the Military Establishment was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, let the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1542) for the relief of Philip A. Hertz was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may that bill be temporarily laid aside until I have a chance to examine the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing transportation for dependents of Army field clerks and field clerks Quartermaster Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2328) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ACCOUNTS OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

The bill (S. 2801) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 21 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896 (29 Stats., pp. 146–185), is hereby amended by adding at the end of said section the following provisos, to wit: "Provided further, That the accounts of the United States commissioners shall be rendered quarterly under such regulations as the Attorney General may prescribe: And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the Treasury in settlement of any account of a United States commissioner for fees earned by any such commissioner subsequent to the date of the approval of this act which is not rendered by him within one year from the expiration of the quarter covered thereby."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY RECORDS FOR PERSONS REPORTING FOR MILITARY DUTY.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) to provide for appropriate military records for persons who, pursuant to orders, reported for military duty but whose induction or commission into the service was not, through no fault of their own, formally completed on or prior to November 11, 1918, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order, and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to carry upon the records of the War Department as though he had been duly inducted into the service of the United States any registrant under the selective service law and regulations who applied for voluntary induction into the service and was accepted, and who, pursuant to competent orders, reported for active duty as a soldier, but whose induction into the service, through no fault of his own, was not formally completed on or prior to November 11, 1918; and the name of any such person shall, under this act and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, be so carried upon the records of the War Department, and any such person shall be deemed to have been a soldier and shall be regarded as such from and after the date on which, pursuant to competent orders, he reported for active duty as a soldier, to such extent as to entitle him to receive the regular pay and allowances of an enlisted man for the period of his actual military service and to a discharge from the service as of the date of the termination of such service: Provided, That such persons shall not be entitled to any bonus, gratuity, or clothing or travel allowance authorized by law for enlisted men upon discharge from the service.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue an appropriate commission in the name of any person who, while in the military service of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary, had been duly appointed to a commissioned grade, and, through no fault of his own, was unable to accept such commission by reason of his death in line of duty; and any such commission shall issue as of the date of such appointment, and after such appointment any such person's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service to which he would have been promoted by such commission.

SEC. 3. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue an appropriate commission in the name of any person who, while in the military service of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and Austria-Hungary, may have been officially recommended for promotion to a commissioned grade, which recommendation shall have been duly approved by the Secertary of War, or by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, as the case may be, and who shall have been unable to receive and accept such commission by reason of his death in line of duty; and any such commission shall issue as of the date of such approval, and thereafter any such person's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service to which he would have been promoted by such commission.

SEC. 4. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue an appropriate commission to any person who, on or prior to November 11, 1918, performed the service of a commissioned officer of the United States Army under the promise of or agreement in good faith with proper authority that a commission would in due time be issued to him, and by reason of unavoidable delay, the signing of the armistice, the cessation of hostilities, and orders issued in consequence thereof, no commission was ever issued to him in accordance with such promise or agreement; and any such commission shall issue as of the date of the commencement of such service and in such grade and branch of the service as promised or agreed upon; and any such person's name shall be carried upon the records of the War Department as of the grade and branch of the service shown in such commission.

SEC. 5. That no person shall be entitled to receive any bonus, gratuity, pay, or allowances by virtue of any commission issued under sections 2, 3, or 4 of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is a very important measure. I do not want to object, but before consenting to its consideration I should like to have a very brief explanation made. It seems to me that there are too few limitations in the joint resolution. If it is merely for the purpose of reaching the four or five hundred, or possibly thousand, young men who reported just prior to the armistice, and who had, to all intents and purposes, entered into the military service, but whose entrance had not been officially recognized here in Washington, and the measure is one to validate their services, I can see no objection; but it seems to go further. It provides for the giving of commissions to persons to whom promises of commissions were made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. We are advised, if my colleague will just permit me a moment, that a great many officers in France were promised promotions, and the termination of hostilities contributed to the delay in action, and the promotions never were made. I am advised that some officers claimed that promises of promotion were made by their superior officers, and there may be a controversy as to whether they had the authority, and, as the Senator will see, many controversies might arise in respect to that matter. How far does the joint resolution go?

Mr. SMOOT. It provides that in such cases as the Senator has cited it shall not apply, unless they were unavoidably delayed; in other words, if a man was in France and Gen. Pershing had passed upon his promotion, and it had to come here to Washington, and on account of the armistice, the cessation of hostilities, and orders issued in pursuance thereof, the commissions were withheld, then the commissions shall be issued to such persons, but in no other case. It is limited to cases like that, as the Senator will see by reading the bill.

Mr. KING. How many will be affected by the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not state just the number, but there will not be very many under that paragraph of the joint resolution. The Senator has asked as to those who were inducted into the service through the draft. He will notice also that in section 3 it provides that the commission shall issue if the recommendation has been "duly approved by the Secretary of War or by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, as the case may be, and who shall have been unable to receive and accept such commission by reason of his death in line of duty." I think there are not more than a dozen cases where the commission had been agreed upon and actually issued by the War Department here, and was on its way, but the officer was killed before the arrival of the commission and never received it. It takes in about a dozen such cases, and I thought it was pretty well guarded; but if the Senator desires to have it go over, that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire as to section 4, which reads:

> That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue an appropriate commission to any person who, on or before November 11, 1918, performed the service of a commissioned officer of the United States Army under the promise of or agreement in good faith with proper authority that a commission would in due time be issued to him.

And so forth.

Who would be the proper authority to make such a promise? Under what circumstances could a promise be made which ought to bind the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of War, or Gen. Pershing in case it was in Europe. I do not think there is any doubt as to that. Then, if the Senator will read on, he will find that it provides:

> By reason of unavoidable delay, the signing of the armistice, the cessation of hostilities, and orders issued in consequence thereof.

That is the only case covered. I can not state how many there are, but I can not believe there are very many of them.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that there ought to be a general statute which would reach cases of this character. Certainly during the Civil War, when we had so many hundreds of thousands of men in the service, conditions arose similar to the conditions indicated here. Does the Senator know whether there was then any general or special statute to permit commissions to be granted under conditions analogous to those indicated in this joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked that up, nor would I be able to say offhand, because the question was never brought to my attention before.

Mr. KING. I am very much in sympathy with the general purpose of the joint resolution. I will ask my colleague to let it go over until the next calendar day so that we may examine it further.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 2556) to advance Capt. Benjamin S. Berry to the permanent rank of major was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1460) for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1298) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 37) granting pensions to certain members of the former Life Saving Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MARKING OF ANCHORAGE GROUNDS.

The bill (S. 2199) to provide for the marking of anchorage grounds in waters of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the Commissioner of Lighthouses shall provide, establish, and maintain, out of the annual appropriations for the Lighthouse Service, buoys or other suitable marks for marking anchorage grounds for vessels in waters of the United States, when such anchorage grounds have been defined and established by proper authority in accordance with law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 7589) for the relief of Maj. Ellis B. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1690) to correct the military record of John Sullivan was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SUBTREASURY PROPERTY AT SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 5700) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to the highest bidder, at public or private sale, the old Subtreasury property, located on the north side of Commercial Street about 60 feet west of Montgomery Street, and known as 608 Commercial Street, San Francisco, Calif., in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States; to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOMHOUSE WHARF AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

The bill (H. R. 8401) to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the custody and control of the Treasury Department to that of the War Department, and that all branches of the public service now using said wharf shall be permitted to continue their use of the same.

Mr. DIAL. Will not the Senator from Maine state the object of the bill?

Mr. FERNALD. The report I get on it is that the object is to transfer the custody and control of the customhouse wharf at Charleston from the Treasury to the War Department. The wharf was constructed in the beginning for the use of the Customs Service. Now its use for that purpose has practically ceased. The Customs Service and the Navy Department make a limited use of it only; it is used chiefly by the War Department.

The expense of the dredging will be lessened by the transfer, as the War Department has a dredge in the harbor now. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War both are agreeable to the transfer, and both recommend it. The bill passed the House unanimously.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC COMMISSARY CO.

The bill (S. 34) for the relief of the Pacific Commissary Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I shall be glad to hear any explanation the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] may have to offer. It looks to me, from a reading of the bill, as if a contract was entered into, and that the contractor is not now satisfied with what was paid, and wants the Government to pay an additional thirty or forty thousand dollars.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to explain to the Senator from Utah that there was not a particular or valid contract which was entered into between the claimants and the Government, but there was an understanding with the commandant at Camp Lewis, which at the time this loss occurred was in process of construction. They were also training soldiers there. It was just in the beginning of the war. Officers were brought in from California, from the Presidio and other officers' training camps, and left there temporarily. There was no place to feed them nearer than Tacoma, 16 miles away from Camp Lewis, so the commandant asked the people who were running this commissary if they would provide to take care of the officers. They agreed to do that, and the price fixed was about $1 per day, or about 33 cents per meal.

These officers were often ordered from the camp secretly and they did not have an opportunity to pay their bills, and there was a loss occasioned by officers leaving without paying their bills. The matter extended over a period of some four months before the question of settlement came up. The Commissary Department did not know what the Government was charging them for supplies, either, but they presumed that a settlement would be made. Gen. Stone recommended that such a settlement be made, but in the absence of a contract there was nothing for them to do but to come to Congress and ask for relief.

There were some 450,000 meals served. The statement shows a loss of about 7 cents on each meal.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, my recollection is, though it is very hazy, that the cost at some of these camps to the Government was less than $1 a day for meals. They fed officers, as I recall, in San Francisco for approximately $1 a day; indeed, less. I may be in error respecting that matter, however. As I understand the Senator, the Government actually paid the claimants $1 a day for these officers, and now they claim that there was a deficit and that they lost money on the contract and they want further compensation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice in making up the claim that there is included uncollected accounts of officers amounting to $10,753.41. Is it possible that officers of the United States did not pay their board bills?

Mr. STANFIELD. That actually occurred by reason of the fact that they were ordered away secretly very often. They were transported across the seas in that way during the war. An effort was made on the part of the Commissary Department to make collections from those officers, but many of the letters were returned with a notation that the officers could not be found.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have a list of the officers who have jumped their board bills and do not intend to pay them, thus causing a company to come to Congress and ask that the Congress of the United States pay their unpaid board bills. I would like to know the names of those officers.

Mr. STANFIELD. The Senator understands that these claims are very small as to each individual officer.

Mr. SMOOT. They could not be very small, because the amount is $10,753.41. I ask that the bill may go over and I will talk to the Senate about it. There are a number of things in the items enumerated in the claims that I think need explanation, and particularly the one to which I have referred.

Mr. STANFIELD. There were more than 450,000 meals served.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the request of the Senator from Utah, the bill will go over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective-service law, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation made of the measure. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not here, and therefore I shall ask that the joint resolution go over unless the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] can explain it.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I can only say that there are a number of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the chairman of that committee asked me, as he went out of the Chamber to attend a committee meeting, to request that they be permitted to go over until he could be personally present.

Mr. KING. I think the measure is meritorious. I ask that the Secretary read the report which accompanies the joint resolution. I think that will give a full explanation. I am in sympathy with the measure. I think it is to prevent—to use a common expression—the outlawing of offenses which have been committed and to extend the time within which those who deserted or who are amenable to some military statute may be tried.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the object of the joint resolution I do not think anybody will object to its passage, but I have not had time to read the report.

Mr. KING. I think that is the purpose, but let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Utah withdraw his objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; until the report is read.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the report (No. 367).

Mr. SMOOT. I have just glanced hurriedly over the report, and I will say that it shows the object of the joint resolution is as stated by my colleague. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to its present consideration and passage.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That none of the provisions contained in section 2 of the act of May 18, 1917 (40 Stat., 77), or in section 4 of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat., 217), or in any other act or joint resolution of Congress, or in any proclamation heretofore issued by the President, or in any proclamation of peace that may hereafter be issued by the President, shall be construed as terminating the military or naval status of any person who, having been drafted or having voluntarily enlisted for the period of the emergency due to the World War in the military or naval service of the United States, or having been commissioned as an officer for the period of said emergency in the military or naval forces of the United States, thereafter deserted such military or naval service; or as terminating before the expiration of three years after the date of the President's proclamation of peace as required by section 4 of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat., 217), exclusive of all periods of absence from the jurisdiction of the United States, the amenability to prosecution and trial of any person who willfully failed or refused to comply with any of the requirements of the act of May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," or of said act as amended, or with regulations promulgated by the President pursuant thereto.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROP-FAILURE LOANS.

The bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a yield of 5 bushels or less per acre of wheat, rye, or oats on lands owned by those in the drought-stricken regions who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a failure, and the borrower whose yield was 5 bushels or less per acre be, and he is hereby, released from repayment of the amount borrowed by him from the Government: Provided, That nothing herein shall release the borrower who signed a guaranty-fund agreement and whose crop was not a failure from making the contribution provided for in such agreement, but said guaranty fund shall be used as stipulated in the agreement to the settlement of the loans to those whose crop was a failure: Provided further, That any such borrower whose crop was a failure, as herein defined, and who made payment on his loan prior to May 31, 1920, shall be fully reimbursed from such guaranty fund.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think I can make a statement that will probably prevent any objection to the passage of the bill.

The only new feature of the bill is comprised in the last three or four lines. In the Agricultural appropriation act of 1920 the first part of the pending bill was included. Under the agreement to loan money to farmers there were two provisions. One was that those who had a crop of less than 5 bushels to the acre should be considered as having crop failures, and they were not to be required to repay the loan. Those who raised over 6 bushels to the acre were to contribute to a guaranty fund to make up the amount of money that might have to be paid out under the other provision.

I offered an amendment to that appropriation bill, thinking it would cover all the losses; but it happened that the department had demanded payment from a number of people, and that some of them had paid, in some instances even mortgaging their little personal property to raise the money.

The bill passed as amended, and those who had not paid were thus relieved from payment. However, there was paid by those who had crop failures $68,000. There is in that guaranty fund to-day $246,000, so that this $68,000 can be refunded to those who paid and who should not have been required to pay, leaving in the guaranty fund approximately $170,000 to be returned or covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the original amount appropriated?

Mr. CURTIS. There was no legislation respecting that. In 1919 the President of the United States set aside, out of his war fund, a certain amount of money to loan to farmers who had had two crop failures in wheat, oats, and rye. This money was loaned to the farmers of Kansas and other States who had had crop failures of wheat, oats, and rye.

Mr. KING. How large was the fund?

Mr. CURTIS. I could not tell the Senator that. There was about $1,000,000 loaned to our State, or something less than that perhaps. There was nearly $5,000,000 loaned all told. Many of the loans were paid back by the farmers to whom the loans were made. The $246,000 was paid into the guaranty fund; that is, those who raised more than 6 bushels to the acre had to pay back their loans and then contribute a certain amount per bushel on every bushel they produced over 6 bushels to create a guaranty fund to make good for those who lost by reason of crop failure or who had less than 5 bushels per acre, which was considered a crop failure under the act. I have a report now from the Farm Loan Board that there is in that fund some $246,000 and these claims amount to about $68,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That would leave $178,000 in the fund?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. What would become of the residue?

Mr. CURTIS. That goes back into the Treasury. These are all the claims and they have not been settled because the department had asked for the legislation. It is not right to compel these people to pay when there was a positive provision or agreement in the legislation that less than 5 bushels per acre should be considered a failure of the crop.

Mr. KING. The Government will be out nothing except the interest on the advances which it made?

Mr. CURTIS. That is all.

Mr. KING. And this $170,000 will compensate the Government for losses which it sustained because of being deprived of its money for so long a period?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think the Government lost anything.

Mr. KING. It lost the interest on the money loaned.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think all of those who had failures have paid.

Mr. CURTIS. Not all of them. Many were relieved, but counting out those who were relieved there is still in the fund $246,000, paid in as I have explained.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, paid into the guaranty fund?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think those payments have not been made as yet, but those who did pay back and thus made up the guaranty fund of $246,000 should have been relieved. Many of them have not paid and of course still owe the Government. However, that cuts no figure in this case because, as I understand it, in every case their crops were so small that they constituted a failure.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; and they should not have been required to pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND FOR STREET PURPOSES IN CHICAGO.

The bill (H. R. 9021) to permit the city of Chicago to acquire real estate of the United States of America, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the payment by the city of Chicago to the United States of America of the just compensation and damages for the real estate hereinafter described, as ascertained by a jury in proceedings to condemn real estate of the United States of America, the city of Chicago is hereby authorized to acquire for street purposes by two separate condemnation proceedings all interests of the United States of America in and to the following-described parcels of real estate, viz:

(a) The east 17 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet of south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois; and

(b) The east 17 feet of (except south 149 feet of south 100 feet of north 133 feet of west 125 feet of east 158 feet) south quarter of east half of northeast quarter of section 30, township 38 north, range 14 east, of third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend such portion of said award as in his judgment may be necessary to restore or repair Government buildings or improvements taken or damaged by reason of the taking of said parcels of real estate; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to accept service and to appear on behalf of the United States to the extent necessary to protect the interest of the United States in said proceedings: Provided, That in the event the amount estimated and included in the jury's award for the restoration and repair of said buildings and improvements made necessary by the taking of said parcels of real estate shall prove insufficient for said purposes the city of Chicago shall pay any difference or balance not covered by said award therefor.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 548) to place Albert Hamilton on the retired list of the United States Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2718) to provide for leasing of the floating dry dock at the naval station, New Orleans, La., was announced as next in order.

Mr. CALDER. I would like to have the bill go over, as I wish to examine it carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2719) to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States naval hospital, naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

The bill (H. R. 6380) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 2, 3, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That membership in this association shall be limited to master Masons, and that the business and objects of the society or corporation shall be to provide, maintain, and disburse a fund for the benefit of the members, their wives, widows, children, orphans, dependents, heirs, assignees, legatees, or beneficiaries, and for this purpose it shall and may be lawful for the said society or corporation to make all and every insurance appertaining to or connected with life or disability risks of whatever kind and nature; and, in addition thereto, to provide, maintain, and disburse a fund for owning, establishing, maintaining, and operating homes, hospitals, sanitariums, and any other aid or service for its members, master Masons, their wives, widows, children, orphans, dependents, or beneficiaries; and because of its fraternal organization and benevolent purposes it shall be defined and classed as a fraternal beneficial society: Provided, however, That upon all contracts of insurance it shall maintain a reserve fund adequate to meet all liabilities thereon, and which in case of life risks shall be not less than that computed upon the American experience table of mortality at 4 per cent interest.

"SEC. 3. That the number of directors of said association shall be at least 21, a number of whom, less than a majority, shall be elected annually by the members of the association from among themselves and shall serve for three years. In all cases of a tie vote the choice to be determined by lot, and in all other cases a plurality vote shall decide. That the annual meeting of said association shall be held on the third Tuesday in February of each year, and said directors shall, at their first meeting succeeding the annual meeting of the association, elect one of their number to be president of the board of directors, who shall also be president of the association, and shall elect one of their number as vice president, and one of their number or a member of the association as secretary of the association, and the said secretary of the association shall give bond with surety to said association in such sum as the board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his duties; and one of their number as treasurer, who shall also give bond with surety to said association in such sum as the said board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. At all meetings of the board of directors 12 members of the board shall form a quorum. In case of any vacancy in the board of directors by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the remaining directors from among the members of said association for the remainder of the unexpired term.

"SEC. 5. That the said board of directors may be increased from time to time to a number not exceeding the number of grand lodges of Masons in the United States, and the said board shall be capable of taking and holding the funds, property, and effects of said corporations, which funds, property, or effects shall forever be devoted to the purpose mentioned in section 2 hereof."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDUSTRIAL DEPRESSION AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

The bill (S. 2749) to prepare for future cyclical periods of depression and unemployment by systems of public works, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That bill will take some time for discussion. Its object is meritorious, but I suggest that it go over, so that we may have a little further time to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

PHILIP A. HERTZ.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, when the calendar was being called, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] suggested that the bill (S. 1542) for the relief of Philip A. Hertz be temporarily laid aside. I now ask unanimous consent that that bill may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill named by him, which was temporarily passed over, may be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let the report on the bill be read.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I can explain the bill. The soldier who is to be the beneficiary of this bill at 14 years of age, in 1861, enlisted as a drummer boy in a New York regiment and served two years and a half. He then reenlisted as a veteran volunteer and served for about 15 months in the ranks as a private soldier, carrying a musket. He was very badly wounded in the battle of Petersburg, and was sent to the hospital, where he remained about two months. He was then given a furlough to go home to his place of residence in New York City. There, according to the affidavit of his sister, broken in health, at 17 years of age, being a veteran of three years' service, he was confined to his home for over a year. When he recovered, the war was over and therefore he did not return to his regiment. He is now a man 78 years of age, broken in health. His family and children are exceedingly anxious that before he dies his record in the service of his country may be cleared.

It seems to me that a man who, beginning as a boy of 14 years, served three years and a half with combat troops in the Civil War, who was wounded in battle, should certainly now at 78 years of age, in the last days of his life, be accorded this consideration at the hands of the Government.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Philip A. Hertz, late of Company H, Sixty-first Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 18th day of July, 1864, but that no bounty, pay, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the enactment of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RURAL HOMES.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 491) to provide, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Reclamation Service, is authorized to investigate and determine the feasibility of developing tracts of land in private ownership, by reclamation and otherwise, for the purpose of subdividing the land and disposing of the same in farms and parcels at reasonable prices.

SEC. 2. That after the Secretary of the Interior has determined the feasibility of a project, he is authorized, through the Reclamation Service, to develop the land to such extent and dispose of the same in farms and parcels in such manner and upon such terms as to him shall be deemed most feasible and practicable.

SEC. 3. That no moneys of the United States shall be expended for any of the purposes of this act, nor shall either the investigation or development of any project be commenced or any obligation incurred therefor until a contract shall have first been made by the Secretary of the Interior with the owner or owners of the land, or a district or other organization representing such owners, providing for the payment in advance to the United States of sufficient moneys to meet the estimated cost, and thereafter of sufficient moneys to meet the actual cost of such investigation or development, and no expense shall be incurred by the Government in excess of moneys already advanced. All time given by any officer or employee of the United States on account of any such contract shall be charged against such contract. The moneys provided by every such contract shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a trust fund, and shall be disbursed by a duly authorized fiscal officer of the Government under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and in accordance with the terms of such contract.

SEC. 4. That every contract for development of a project shall provide, among other things, that the developed farms and parcels shall be sold to persons who desire to occupy the same as homes at the actual cost of the land and the development thereof plus a definite reasonable profit to the owner or owners stated in advance therein. If any landowner shall, in any such contract, reserve from disposal hereunder a farm or parcel of his lands for his own home, the same shall be subject to the payment of such construction charge as may be equitably apportioned against it on account of the development of the project. All contracts for the purchase of farms and parcels, and the proceeds therefrom, shall belong to the owner or owners of the land or their assigns.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the provisions of this bill have been discussed a number of times in the Senate. I am sure that if the bill passes the Senate and House of Representatives and shall be signed by the President, it will be of great benefit to every section of the country. I do not desire to take up any more of the time of the Senate in a discussion of the bill, for I do not think it is necessary that I shall do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the bill as I understand is in the form of a reclamation measure without requiring the use of any governmental funds?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. It permits those who are interested in the irrigation or reclamation of lands to employ the services of the engineering department of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on privately owned lands.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to the bill; I think it is a very meritorious measure; but I wish to ask if the department has reported on the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Former Secretaries of the Interior Lane and John Barton Payne reported in favor of the bill, as has the present Secretary, Mr. Fall.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill. I am not able, however, to share the views that are entertained by my esteemed friend, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] relative to the measure. I believe that the bill will not operate as my friend thinks it will. In my opinion it will impose great burdens upon the Government and will result in heavy drafts being made upon the personnel of the Reclamation Service. They will be called upon to engage in activities in behalf of private corporations and private land-owning enterprises, and to that extent they will be drawn away from the work which they should perform for the Government. That will necessitate an enlargement of the personnel and add to the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. The cost will be paid by the parties who receive such services.

Mr. KING. Of course they will pay for the services which are rendered to them, but, as I suggested a moment ago, it is bound to increase the personnel of the service. It is obvious that if the bill is to amount to anything and private persons shall avail themselves of its provisions drafts will be made upon the personnel of the department, and as they go out to give their technical and expert services to private individuals the Government will lose their services during that period, and if the reclamation work is to go on the Government will be compelled to employ other engineers. But that is not the feature which to me is the most obnoxious. I believe that in the end it will put the Government morally behind all sorts of irrigation projects conducted by private individuals.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator at that point?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. What limitation does the Senator put upon the expression "by reclamation and otherwise"? He is speaking now of irrigation. The bill by its terms, however, seems to include the drainage of swamp lands and the reclamation of cut-over lands——

Mr. SMOOT. It does.

Mr. KING. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. Which is a very large undertaking. In the South it is estimated that there are 200,000,000 acres of swamp land, and there are 20,000,000 acres of irrigable land in the West. I will ask the senior Senator from Utah if the bill would include the improvement of the soil by fertilization—the renovation and restoration of worn-out soils?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill includes all of the swamp lands and cut-over lands of the United States held in private ownership; but if the reclamation is to take place under the terms of the bill the parties owning the land will have to pay every dollar of the expense.

I wish to say to my colleague that to-day I think there are very few reclamation projects being investigated by the Irrigation Service, and it would be a godsend to that service and to the men who are employed there if more work could be placed upon them.

I know there are about three propositions ready to be taken up under this bill just as soon as it passes, two of the projects being in California and one in the Eastern States. I think also that there are two to be taken up in the Southern States. I am sure that there are $15,000,000 at least ready to go into such projects; but the land is under the control of individual owners, and under existing law they can not very well proceed with the work of development.

I will assure the Senate that so far as any expense to the Government of the United States is concerned that is the farthest thought in my mind or in the minds of those who prepared the bill. I have talked to Mr. Davis, of the Reclamation Service, time and time again. He is heartily in favor of the measure and he sees no trouble whatever in its administration. The late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, was so enthusiastic about it that he referred to it in his annual report and called attention to what it meant to the Government and people of the United States. I think it has also been referred to by the two Secretaries of the Interior who have succeeded Mr. Lane. The only object in the world I have in pressing the legislation is that I think it will reclaim lands that can not be reclaimed in any other way.

Mr. McNARY. The thought I have in that connection is that there is a heavy burden already placed upon the Reclamation Service to care even for the feasible projects in the West which are known as irrigation projects. Has the Senator given thought to the probable enlargement of the work to be done by the Reclamation Service under bills now pending in Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and so has Mr. Davis.

Mr. McNARY. If some of the pending measures which would increase the work of the service should be passed by Congress, would the engineers in the service at this time be able to take care of this additional work plus all the private requests and demands that may be made upon them?

Mr. SMOOT. To my mind they would. At any rate, the only result will be that wherever there is an individual application, if the Reclamation Service have not the help to take care of it under the organization they have to-day, they will hire an additional engineer, and he will investigate in behalf of the Government and make a report.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that there are to-day pending with the Director of the Reclamation Service applications for employment by the Government from some of the best engineers in the United States. Mr. Davis not more than two months ago told me that his bureau had a list of such engineers, and that frequently when applications came in from private concerns in different parts of the country for experienced engineers the Reclamation Service took great pleasure in recommending the name of some engineer who had made application to the Government and whose name was on the list.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I assume the reason the Senator has for asking the Government to furnish such engineers is on account of their peculiar skill, but the money to pay for their services is to be paid by private parties. Is it not usual when it is desired to investigate concerning private lands for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility of their reclamation by drainage or by the removal of stumps or what not to hire or employ private engineers?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; that is one reason why private individuals can not finance such projects to-day. Some time ago I held a conference with Secretary Lane and a number of bankers of Chicago and New York interested in advancing money upon reclamation projects.

The Senator knows just as well as I know what has been the history of these projects in the past. Generally the man who has started the project and raised the first money on it never gets anything out of it. In fact, he generally loses all that he puts in; and the record shows that the project is usually transferred to other parties two or three times before it is finally a success. What the men want who in the past have put their money into these projects and are perfectly willing to do so in the future is the stamp of approval of the Government upon the project. They want to have it passed upon by a Government engineer and have that stamp of approval placed upon it.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is speaking now, I assume, of private projects?

Mr. SMOOT. Private projects.

Mr. McNARY. Very slight losses have been sustained by the Government projects.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking of private projects, and I understood that the Senator referred to them.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator did not make that clear to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator says that these companies, banks, and so on, want the stamp of approval of the Government engineers. Suppose that a Government engineer approves one of these projects and says it will cost $100,000, and when they go to put it in they find that it costs $500,000. Will not these companies be likely to come to the Government and say, "Here; the Government engineer was either incompetent or his judgment was not good, and by reason of our relying upon it we have lost a lot of money. Now, then, you must make good"?

Mr. SMOOT. That question was discussed here before; and I will simply say that there is not a thing in the bill that obligates the Government in any way, shape, or form. Anybody who reads the bill can see that under its terms there can be no moral obligation whatever on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think there would be any moral obligation; and yet the statement of the Senator was that these people want the stamp of the Government's approval, the approval of the Government's engineers. They have not confidence in private engineers. They want the approval of the Government engineers.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I went too far when I said "the approval of the Government's engineer," and yet it would be an approval in the sense that it would express his opinion that the project was likely to be a successful one. There is nothing in the bill, however, to bind the Government of the United States in any way, shape, or form. On the contrary, it specifically states that it shall not bind the Government of the United States, and that all of the expenses shall be paid by the parties interested.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is there a specific statement in the bill that the Government does not guarantee and will not make good any representations made by its engineers?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no such statement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think that there really ought to be a positive statement of that kind? We know—I think the Senator's experience in his State has been the same that we have had in ours—that the Government engineers, in estimating the cost of reclamation projects, have fallen far short of reaching a correct estimate. As a matter of fact, while I do not criticize them for it—I think it was almost impossible to reach an exact estimate—yet I know of projects in my State where the estimated cost was $40 an acre, and it has cost over $100 an acre to reclaim the land. The settlers have to pay it. Suppose that had been a private project, and the Government engineer had estimated for these bankers that it would cost $40 an acre, and they had put in their money, and after it was put in it turned out that the cost was $100 or $110 an acre. While I do not think they would have a moral claim upon the Government in a way, yet I can see their attorneys around here, and all sort of pleas made to the Claims Committee and to the different committees of Congress showing the great hardship that had been brought upon them by the poor judgment and incapacity of the Government's engineer.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read section 3 of the bill, he will find that it answers what he says.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not had time. The bill has just come up.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 3 reads as follows:

That no moneys of the United States shall be expended for any of the purposes of this act, nor shall either the investigation or development of any project be commenced or any obligation incurred therefor until a contract shall have first been made by the Secretary of the Interior with the owner or owners of the land, or a district or other organization representing such owners, providing for the payment in advance to the United States of sufficient moneys to meet the estimated cost—

There is the estimated cost—and thereafter of sufficient moneys to meet the actual cost of such investigation or development, and no expense shall be incurred by the Government in excess of moneys already advanced.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is for the investigation. With the purposes of the bill I am in hearty accord, as everyone would be, of course, and I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Utah.

I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I can see all sorts of possible complications for the Government, and claims for losses and damages against the Government, growing out of this measure, in addition to what seems to me to be the creation of a sort of a real estate agency out of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say further, in reference to the real object of the bill, that every Senator in the West knows that where these private reclamation projects have been put into operation the lands sold under them have been sold at such a price that it was almost impossible, and in many cases impossible, for the purchaser of the land to meet the payments and the obligations. Under this provision that can not be done; and if we are going to have any kind of reclamation in the West of privately owned lands, this is the only plan I see by which it can be done. With the conditions now existing in the South, as far as swamp lands are concerned, and in the Northwest, as far as cut-over lands are concerned, and in the arid States, where arid lands are in the hands of private individuals, it seems to me that the result of passing the bill will be greater than I can possibly think of now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Following up the thought of the Senator from Washington as to the liability of the Government, moral or otherwise, in section 1 the Secretary is authorized to investigate and determine the feasibility of developing the land. In section 2, after he has determined the feasibility of the project, he is authorized to develop the land. That is going a very great way on private land—first, to determine the feasibility of the project, and second, to develop it through the agencies of the Government.

As the Senator from Washington so well knows, the judgment of engineers differs very widely. Here you are dealing with private land. Reclamation heretofore has usually been applied to public lands. I think I might as well say to the Senator from Utah that while the general purpose of the bill may be all right, I should not want to see him press the bill to-day, as I want to discuss some of its features with the Reclamation Service, with a view to formulating an enlarged plan to be offered for the consideration of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I shall respect the wishes of the Senator; but I am perfectly willing that he shall go down to the department and discuss the bill with the Secretary of the Interior, or Judge Finney, or Mr. Davis, of the Reclamation Service, or anyone else.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that. I think there are two or three matters here that might be changed, and suggestions offered in the way of amendments. If we can just pass over the bill for the present, I will see these officials in a few days.

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw my request, Mr. President, for the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is finished.

RETIREMENT OF WOUNDED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 1565, Order of Business 228. It is a bill with reference to relief for emergency officers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that that bill can not be passed to-night.

Mr. BURSUM. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. Because I shall have a great deal to say about it if we are to take it up.

Mr. BURSUM. The bill has been on the calendar for four months.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been here longer than that.

Mr. KING. It will be here a good deal longer before the Senator gets it through the Senate.

Mr. BURSUM. Well, let us have a vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that that bill can not pass to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico has moved that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. KING. That motion is open to debate, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is debatable.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate has been taking up entirely too much time in making objections to bills instead of considering them. The country is expecting some action. This is one of many bills that have been on the calendar for many months. It is a very important bill. It will require the consideration of the House if it should pass the Senate. It affects our disabled soldiers. Nearly all of us have publicly said that we are in favor of doing anything we can to help the disabled soldiers. Here is an opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we are doing it. We have appropriated over $500,000,000 for that purpose, and if any disabled soldier wants any more help, I am perfectly willing to vote to give him the help; but I am not going, if I can help it, to load up the retired list with men who will be taken care of as long they live outside of what we appropriate for them.

Mr. BURSUM. Why not? If a man has served his country on the field of battle and has met the same hazards as those of the Regular Army, why should he not be entitled to the same privileges, the same rights, and the same pensions?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not heard the Senator utter one word about the same class of men who were in the Civil War, and we can not even get pensions for them here. If we are going now to begin to treat the officers of the World War——

Mr. BURSUM. We might include all of the officers of the Civil War, and it would not very seriously affect this country.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in view of the lateness of the hour, and the fact that we want an executive session and an early adjournment to-night, may I ask the Senator if he will not withdraw his motion and bring up the bill at some other time?

Mr. BURSUM. I withdraw the motion with the understanding that I will renew it to-morrow morning.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator can do that, if he wants to, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to address the Senate briefly.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Alabama has told me that he wants 5 or 10 minutes. I yield to him for that purpose.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, some time ago I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1904 Truman H. Newberry was a candidate against the present Secretary of the Navy for the Republican nomination for the lower House of Congress. The New York World, editorially in speaking of that campaign, said:

Once before Truman H. Newberry sought political office at the hands of the Republican voters. He was a candidate in the primaries for the Republican nomination for Congress in 1904 against Edwin Denby, the present Secretary of the Navy, and at the time the Detroit newspapers abounded in charges against him of making a boodle campaign. In 1904 and 1918 there was shown the same Newberry theory of politics. The only difference is that in 1904 he was beaten in the primaries, while in 1918 he had a majority in a campaign where the weight of money won.

The Senate as a body has still to give its answer, not in the name merely of a Republican majority interested in shielding a fellow Republican but as the United States Senate sitting in judgment on Truman H. Newberry, of Michigan, whose promotion to the Senate cost $250,000 and who escaped imprisonment for corrupt practices only because of a decision of the United States Supreme Court turning on a technical point.

Mr. President, some of the Senators on the other side, defending Mr. Newberry's course, and who expect to vote to give him voice and vote in this body, said that he was compelled to expend this large sum of money; that Henry Ford was the candidate against him, and because Ford was expending a great deal of money, he was compelled to expend a great deal.

That charge will not hold water. A Republican Senate committee itself acknowledges that those in charge of the Newberry case have withdrawn all charges against Henry Ford of using money lavishly in his campaign, so the charges are wiped out, and there is not a scintilla of testimony to the effect that Ford used any money unlawfully in his campaign.

Senators urge that Mr. Newberry was forced to expend money because of the situation I have described. I read this editorial in the New York World of January 1 to show that Truman H. Newberry has been a boodle campaigner since he first entered politics in 1904. He was defeated by Mr. Denby, the present Secretary of the Navy, with whom I had the honor to serve in the House, and as far back as 1904 he made a boodle campaign against Mr. Denby, the present Secretary of the Navy. According to the newspapers of Michigan he sought to buy the congressional nomination in 1904, and I want Senators on the other side, when they come to discuss this case, to bear in mind the facts I am now reciting, and I am speaking to-day for that purpose. I want them to explain, if they can, just why they are defending the title to a seat in this body of a man who undertook when he first entered politics to buy a seat in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In referring to the expenditures by Mr. Ford, the Senator said there was no allegation here that he had spent money lavishly. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any evidence in this record that he spent any money at all?

Mr. HEFLIN. None at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My information is that it is the fact that he not only did not spend money lavishly but he did not spend any.

Mr. HEFLIN. He did not spend any at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thought that ought to be made clear, because the Senator used the word "lavishly," which would rather infer that he had spent some. The word "lavishly" being a relative term, I thought it ought to be brought out that so far as this record shows, and so far as the information obtainable goes, he not only did not spend it lavishly but he did not spend any.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend for his suggestion. That is the fact in the case.

The New York World produced, in its issue of January 1, headlines from Michigan papers of 1904, and I read them for the purpose of placing them in the RECORD before Senators who are going to dare defend this man's title to a seat in this body. Here is a big headline:

[Evening News, Saturday, Oct. 15, 1904.]

The barrel is now wide open.
Who wins, Denby without money or Newberry with it?
Reported that some well-known political workers have changed hearts recently. Coin plenty.

I wish Senators would remember that.

[Detroit Evening News, Oct. 14, 1904.]

Barrel opened.
It is said Newberry's campaign is to boom by it.
It is being freely talked in political circles that some one has opened a big barrel at both ends in the interest of Truman H. Newberry's candidacy for Congress, and many are beginning to wonder how to get close to it.
It is said that Newberry's friends expect to get many in line between now and Monday, and that things will loosen up generally.

Now I read from the Detroit Times:

It was on the east side of the city, especially, that the Denby-Newberry congressional fight waged the warmest. Blue and white Newberry badges were much in evidence, while the old-time political workers were seen to be mostly lined up and doing active work for him. Newberry himself was out in a big automobile loaded with cigars, boxes of which were left for the benefit of the many of the primary election boards. It is estimated that the workers stationed at the booths will cost him $3,000 in payment for their time spent in his behalf.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask if all of those are Republican papers?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think they are.

Mr. CARAWAY. So that is not Democratic propaganda against Senator Newberry.

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. President. I read these headlines from the Michigan papers to show that this man's idea of politics is very low and immoral. I read them into this record for the purpose of having the Senate and the country know just what kind of a man the Republican administration is trying to keep in this body, and just what kind of a man the Republican Senators are going to vote for when they do vote to seat Truman H. Newberry.

Senators can not come in with the charge that Newberry was justified in spending large sums of money because Ford spent money. They have withdrawn those charges. The committee has not a scintilla of testimony to sustain such a charge. Not only have we shown by the testimony that this man had expended over $200,000 to buy a seat in this body, but that he undertook to buy a seat in the other branch of Congress in 1904, 17 years ago.

So, Mr. President, the slimy trail of the boodle serpent is over this man's pathway from the time he entered politics down to the day he bought a senatorial nomination in Michigan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the suggestion that Mr. Newberry was compelled to pay large sums because Mr. Ford was a candidate, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Mr. Newberry became a candidate long before the name of Mr. Ford was suggested; that the great organization which was perfected by Mr. Newberry was perfected long before the name of Mr. Ford was suggested as a candidate for Senator; that Mr. John S. Newberry's contribution, aggregating thousands of dollars, went into the Newberry campaign long before Mr. Ford's name was suggested as a candidate for the Senate; that, finally, when Mr. Ford's name was suggested as a possible candidate for the Senate, the record shows that neither Mr. King, the manager of Mr. Newberry, nor Mr. Newberry himself, regarded Mr. Ford's candidacy with any apprehension.

Their efforts were directed against Gov. Osborn, Mr. Streeter, and one other candidate whose name just escapes me, all of whom were Republicans, because it was anticipated that those men, or at least one of them, would possibly get the nomination. Mr. Osborn was a man well known. He had been governor. Mr. Warner had been a governor upon two occasions, and he was a candidate.

Mr. HEFLIN. He was three times elected governor, I think.

Mr. KING. These Republican candidates for the nomination were the ones against whom the efforts of Mr. Newberry were primarily directed. Mr. Ford never excited the slightest fear in the minds of Mr. Newberry and his managers.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend for his suggestion. He is entirely right.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield just for a brief interruption, because I do not want to speak at length.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know that the Senator cares to know, but the paper from which he has read as a Republican paper is a Democratic paper, in whose estimation no epithet is too low if it is applied to a Republican. That is on a par with many of the other statements which have been made, but so far as the accuracy of that one is concerned, the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator say the Detroit Times is not a Republican paper?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator was reading from the Detroit News, was he not?

Mr. HEFLIN. I was reading from both. Which one is the Republican paper?

Mr. SPENCER. The Democratic paper is the Detroit News.

Mr. HEFLIN. Which one is the Republican paper?

Mr. SPENCER. The Detroit News is the one I heard the Senator read from.

Mr. HEFLIN. I read from the Detroit Times also.

Mr. SPENCER. Is the Detroit Times a Republican paper?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think so. I do not know about either one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. It is an independent paper.

Mr. SPENCER. I understood the Senator to say they were Republican.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said I thought they were.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Whether they were Democratic papers or Republican papers, I am making the point that in 1904 this man's conduct was such in a Republican primary that the papers in his State cried out against it and denounced it as a boodle campaign. I do not care whether they were Democratic papers or Republican papers, it shows just what this man's idea of politics was, and how he was willing to achieve office, how he was willing to promote and satisfy his ambition by undertaking to buy the Republican nomination, and these papers say that he opened the barrel at both ends and that his friends expected to have many changes over to him in a very short time. That meant changes from Denby to Newberry because of Newberry's money.

Now, a moment in regard to ex-Gov. Osborn. Mr. Newberry's letters to Paul King for weeks never referred to Ford. They were leveled entirely at ex-Gov. Osborn. Ex-Gov. Osborn was the man he was afraid of in the primary, a Republican ex-governor of his own State, and Henry Ford was not thought of. He even wrote Paul King that he knew that Osborn's financial condition was bad, and that his funds were about exhausted, or words to that effect. It was Osborn, not Ford, he was afraid of, and all this stuff which Senators are undertaking to inject into this fight in favor of the man who bought this seat in this body is all poppycock. It is utterly ridiculous.

Instead of my good friend, the Senator from Missouri, saying that this is a Republican paper or that a Democratic paper, I want him to deny whether these statements are true or not. Did Truman H. Newberry undertake to buy the nomination for Congress against Mr. Denby in 1904? I have referred to this matter before. I ask the Senator, did Newberry in 1904 undertake to secure his nomination by the lavish use of money in a primary against Mr. Denby, the present Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. SPENCER. I am absolutely safe in denying it in toto, and the Senator from Alabama is also mistaken in saying that the Times is a Republican paper. Every statement the Senator has made that I have heard is based upon a mistake.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my good friend impresses me that he does not know anything about what he said to me. How did he get this information? He has not talked to anybody from Michigan. He has talked only to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and one or two others over there.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has talked to somebody from Michigan. The Senator from Utah did not say anything to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] at all that he did not know to be correct. I am surprised that a Senator of the United States should stand upon the floor of the Senate day after day and condemn a man on account of what appears in newspapers. What would the Senator from Alabama do if the American people were to judge him by what the newspapers said of him?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would get up here and denounce them if they said untruthful things about me. I would denounce them as I have done once or twice. Why do you not denounce these things, those of you who are going to support Mr. Newberry?

Mr. SMOOT. There would not be anything else done in this body if we all spoke as often as the Senator from Alabama. So far as I am concerned, I have not given any time or attention to this matter, and I do not know exactly what the Senator has said in relation to it. I have been attending important committee meetings; I have been compelled to attend them; but I have dropped into the Senate Chamber often enough to hear the Senator repeat and repeat the same old story based upon newspaper reports. Does the Senator think I would ever have had a seat in this body if Senators had acted upon newspaper reports?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah can not get away from the things that I am reading from Michigan newspapers, for they tell us precisely just what Truman H. Newberry was and is in the congressional politics of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can get away from the statement that the Senator from Alabama made that the Detroit News is a Republican paper.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said I thought it was.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator thinks almost everything that will in any way, shape, or form cast a reflection upon Mr. Newberry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. In just a moment. I would be this way against a Democrat under similar circumstances. A Democrat was turned out of this Chamber a few years ago, and I indorsed it. A Republican was turned out a little later, and I indorsed that. I try to be an American patriot above any and every thing else, and I am going to din this into Senators' ears until the final vote is cast. I know they do not like to hear it; I am sure of that.

They just get up and undertake to brush aside the proposition that Newberry sought to buy a seat in Congress in 1904. The newspapers of Michigan started it, and nobody has ever denied it that I know anything about. Yet the Senator from Utah gets up and says, "Does the Senator from Alabama believe everything he reads in the newspapers?" I am making a specific charge from newspapers published in Michigan, whether they be Democratic or Republican. Does anybody think they would have come out and taken sides with Denby, a Republican, against Newberry, another Republican, unless they had something to base the story upon? If they were Democratic papers, why should they be against Newberry and in favor of Denby, both Republicans, unless they were trying to help nominate an honest man and one who did not believe in the buying of seats in Congress? They are to be commended for the stand they took.

I yield now to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understood the Senator from Utah, he said the Detroit News is a Democratic newspaper.

Mr. SMOOT. I did.

Mr. HARRISON. The Detroit News is a great progressive, independent newspaper, the largest in the State of Michigan. The editor is a Mr. Pipp, who is a Republican or Progressive leader, and was succeeded by a Mr. Miller, who has supported the Republican ticket and was a great follower of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. SMOOT. A good many Democratic newspapers supported Theodore Roosevelt, and the Senator knows very well that the Detroit News has fought the Republican Party in the State of Michigan for years and years.

Mr. HARRISON. It ought to have fought it for years and years, because it is a progressive, independent newspaper.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not a progressive, independent newspaper. It is a Democratic paper. The Times is supposed to be a progressive, independent newspaper.

Mr. HARRISON. The Democratic Party will welcome it into its fold all right, like a great many others that once supported the Republican ticket. They are coming over all the time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I never expected to say a word with reference to this matter until the Senator from Alabama referred to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Alabama did not refer to the Senator from Utah until he heard the Senator from Utah whispering loudly to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. I was telling the Senator from Missouri just exactly what is the fact.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, by courtesy of the Senator from Alabama, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he does not know at least, whatever he may think the politics of the Detroit News is, that from the beginning of the campaign of 1918 until its close it was bitter and vindictive and vicious in its opposition to Truman H. Newberry?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, and the fair-minded and honest and just Republicans throughout the State were against Truman H. Newberry, and a jury of Republicans impaneled in the State of Michigan were against him.

Mr. SPENCER. How then, if that be true, does the Senator from Mississippi account for the fact that in the election, the fairness of which is not even questioned in this body, the junior Senator from Michigan, Mr. Newberry, received such a large majority in that State?

Mr. HARRISON. That is what we are trying him here for; we are trying him for corrupting the electorate of that State.

Mr. SPENCER. There is not a charge that there was any corruption or fraud of any kind in the general election.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not yield for speeches by Senators, because I wish to conclude.

There were curious doings in some places in the general election and he bought the nomination to a seat in the Senate. There is a charge, and a proven charge, that he obtained the nomination for the Senate in the primaries by the lavish and unlawful use of money, and the Senate, in its resolution instructing the committee to investigate this case, ordered an investigation of the primaries in connection with the general election. No honest man can deny that if he corruptly obtained the nomination which was necessary to get him elected, his title to a seat in this body ought not to be granted. That is what I am talking about.

Before I sit down I wish to read Mr. Truman H. Newberry's statement. This is what he signed just after the primary:

I have taken no part in it whatever, and no contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge and consent. I have read a general published statement of Paul King—concerning expenditures made by a voluntary committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent.

That was his manager—

Mr. President, I wish to ask Mr. Newberry some questions. "You say you had no part in this whatever?" "Yes." "Did you talk to Paul King when you employed him to be your manager?" "Yes." "Did not he tell you it would cost you $50,000 to get that nomination?" "Yes." "Did not you employ him as your manager?" "Yes." "Well, did not they spend over $200,000, and did not your friends admit that they expended that much in your behalf?" "Yes." "You say you had nothing to do with it whatever?" "Nothing." "Did not you write Paul King to keep the publicity going at full pressure?" "Yes." "Did not you write that Osborn's finances were about exhausted?" "Yes." "Did not you ask him how he liked your evasive answer on a certain proposition?" "Yes." "Did not you thank him for what he had done in your behalf?" "Yes." "And yet you swear before God and the country that you had nothing whatever to do with it?" "Well?" "Did you read Fred Smith's testimony?" "Yes." "Is not he your confidential agent?" "Yes." "Did not he swear he checked on your money and your brother's money, which was in a joint fund, and that that money went into Michigan and worked in the primaries?" "Yes." "Then, who told the truth, Fred Smith, your confidential agent, or yourself?"

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that the papers state that Mr. Newberry talks about coming here and reading a prepared statement. I want the opportunity to ask him some questions. I know of others on both sides of the Chamber who want to ask him some questions. If he will not permit the questions to be asked him, I want him to sit down in this body and hear those questions read and discussed in his presence.

I know the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and others are tired of hearing me din these facts into their ears. I know the program was fixed up over there long ago to seat Newberry——

Mr. SMOOT. I have no program.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know whether you are going to seat him or not. There are several Republican Senators who have been looking into the testimony, and I make bold to say that if any Republican Senator will read the testimony in this case he will vote against Newberry. So, now, Senators, let us keep in mind that he expended money lavishly against Mr. Denby, the Secretary of the Navy, 17 years ago, and that he expended money lavishly against a Republican ex-governor of Michigan who, when he was defeated, wrote Mr. Newberry, "If you deny that you knew of this vast expenditure, you are a liar and an ass."

Senators, remember that when you come to vote to seat this man—yes; I know I am annoying you, but I owe something to my oath of office. I owe something to the masses, the millions in this country of men and women who believe that this sacred legislative institution belongs to the people. I owe something to that vast multitude of people who believe that those who make the laws of the country should be elected by the free and untrammeled vote of the American people. I owe something to those who believe that senatorial campaigns should be kept free from the corrupt use of money and that the honor and integrity of the Senate should be preserved inviolate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and our Father, we can not struggle up to Thee, but Thou dost reach down to us and will lift us back to the place from which we came. For the ocean depths of Thy love we thank Thee. Continue the blessing of Thy fatherly benediction upon us. O Spirit of God, flow through our deeds and make them pure. Give us a fuller measure of self-control, that we may guard wisely our thoughts, our words, and our actions. Persuade us that what we give is more blessed than what we receive. Herein is an achievement for the soul which is big with destiny and abounding in immortal hope. O hear our prayer and encourage us to keep the zest of life and a passion for all good things. Be with us until our last tear falls into the river of heavenly joy. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of my colleague, Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, who is detained at home on account of the illness of his wife, to extend and revise his remarks on the antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (H. R. 9446) to incorporate the American Institute of Accountants, from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2356. An act for the relief of Clarence L. Reames;

S. 943. An act for the relief of John Lyons; and

S. 2138. An act providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2138. An act providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2356. An act for the relief of Clarence L. Reames; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 943. An act for the relief of John Lyons; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6998. An act to amend section 17 of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, and March 2, 1917.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FISCAL YEAR 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9724.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] how much general debate he thinks we ought to have?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Since I talked to the gentleman I have had additional requests. I am wondering if the gentleman is willing to get along with two hours and a half on a side?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to get along with about four hours.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think there is a possibility of getting along with that amount of time.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will be able to agree on four hours.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think, in view of the requests I have, I will not object.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the general debate continue for four hours, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the general debate continue for four hours, half of the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the thought of the gentleman to have the bill read to any great extent under the five-minute rule to-day?

Mr. MADDEN. Only to start it; that is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9724, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish first to express my very cordial thanks to every member of the Committee on Appropriations for the very able assistance they have rendered in connection with the reorganization work devolving upon the committee under the new budget act. I want also to express my cordial thanks to the ablest clerk that ever presided over any work anywhere, Mr. Sheild, the clerk of the committee [applause], and to the assistant clerks of the committee. They have not known hours; no day has been too long; no work too hard. They have done their work cheerfully and done it well. They have devoted all their time during the Christmas holidays, nights, week days, and Sundays, and have had no time off. The members of the committee have labored during this recess. There has been no politics in the committee. Democrats and Republicans alike have joined in every particle of work that has had to be done to make this proposition a success.

Mr. Chairman, this bill comes as the first bill under the new budget act. The act requires the President of the United States to submit what is known as an alternative budget. That created the necessity for the reorganization of all the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, and it brought about the elimination of a great many bills through which appropriations were reported to the House in days gone by. The bills that are now to be brought before the Congress for consideration deal with departmental activities direct. The purpose of the reorganization was to simplify and to clarify, so that every Member of Congress and every citizen of the United States who cared to study the question could tell at once upon the completion of an act just what the appropriations are for a given department. We have taken the liberty of preparing an analysis showing in summary just what each department receives, and have carried that analysis into detail as to every department. The analysis has been placed in the hands of every Member of the House and I commend its study to the Members. I believe it will enable you to know more about the Government, about what it costs to conduct it, than you have ever been able to ascertain before. There never was a time before when any person, no matter how expert he might be, could readily tell just what the cost of a given department was, because the appropriations were carried in five or six different bills. Now, all the appropriations for a given department are carried in one bill, so that when you see the total footings under a bill you will see the total cost. I will insert at this point a statement showing how the appropriation bills are arranged:

FORMER BILLS.	PROPOSED BILLS.
1. Agricultural.	1. Agricultural Department.
2. Army.	2. Commerce and Labor Departments.
3. Diplomatic and Consular.
4. District of Columbia.	3. District of Columbia.
5. Fortification.	4. Executive Office and independent offices, commissions, etc.
6. Indian.
7. Legislative, executive, and judicial.	5. Interior Department.
	6. Legislative branch.
8. Navy.	7. Navy Department.
9. Pension.	8. Post Office Department.
10. Post Office.	9. State and Justice Departments.
11. River and harbor.
12. Sundry civil.	10. Treasury Department.
13. Deficiency.	11. War Department.
	12. Deficiency.

The proposed bills will be composed of items for each department or establishment heretofore distributed in several acts as follows:

1. Agricultural: Items for that department formerly in the Agricultural and sundry civil acts.

2. Commerce and Labor: Items for those departments formerly in the sundry civil and legislative, executive, and judicial acts.

3. District of Columbia: Items formerly carried in the District of Columbia act and all other items in the sundry civil and legislative, executive, and judicial acts chargeable in part against the revenues of the District of Columbia.

4. Executive Office and independent offices: Items formerly carried for these purposes in the sundry civil and legislative, executive, and judicial acts.

5. Interior Department: Items for this department formerly carried in the sundry civil, legislative, executive, and judicial, pension, and Indian acts.

6. Legislative branch: Items for the Senate, House, joint congressional committees and commissions, Capitol police, legislative drafting service, Architect of the Capitol, Library of Congress, Botanic Garden, and Government Printing Office (exclusive of printing and binding for the executive departments), formerly in sundry civil and legislative, executive, and judicial acts.

7. Navy: Items for the Navy formerly carried in the Navy act and for the Navy Department proper, formerly in the legislative, executive, and judicial act.

8. Post Office: Items formerly carried in the Post Office act and for the Post Office Department proper formerly in the legislative, executive, and judicial act.

9. State and Justice: Items for those departments and the courts formerly carried in the sundry civil, legislative, executive, and judicial, and diplomatic and consular acts.

10. Treasury: Items for the Treasury Department formerly in the sundry civil and legislative, executive, and judicial acts.

11. War: Items for the War Department formerly in the Army, fortification, legislative, executive, and judicial, river and harbor, and sundry civil acts; the bill to be divided into two titles, namely, one title for the military activities and expenses directly related thereto and the other for the nonmilitary activities.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Does this information include the appropriations that are permanent and which do not have to be appropriated for each year?

Mr. MADDEN. The analysis does.

Mr. GARNER. But the total appropriations themselves would not reflect just what the expense was?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any effort on the part of your committee to report legislation repealing these permament appropriations, so that they will have to come up hereafter each year?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I am going to deal with that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but after that I would prefer not to yield further until I have made this statement.

Mr. BLANTON. The type of the summary is set up and is in existence, and it is a mere matter of the cost of a few pages of paper to print copies of it. Would the gentleman mind inserting these figures in his remarks, so that the people of the country could get the benefit of them?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not mind placing it there if the House cares to have it done.

Mr. BLANTON. And one question further: No matter how efficient Mr. Dawes is, or how efficient the Budget Committee is, is it not a fact that, after all, they can only recommend to the Congress, and the saving, if there is a saving, must be accomplished by Congress? Is not that the fact?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Of course, this summary was made by the Committee on Appropriations, not by the budget officer.

Now, I will ask the indulgence of the House to be allowed to proceed without interruption until I can outline what is contained in the pending bill.

The budget act presupposes that the Government is a great business institution. It places the responsibility upon the President to state to the Congress what his plans for a given year may be. It also places the responsibility upon the President of stating what the cost of his plans shall be. The President heretofore has never exercised any active influence, I may say, on the preparation of estimates to be submitted to Congress. The President could not ascertain the facts himself; it would be an impossibility; and so the Congress, through the budget act, gave him an instrumentality through which he might be able to ascertain the facts. That instrumentality is the Bureau of the Budget. It is charged with the responsibility of ascertaining the needs of the various departments and bureaus of the Government and estimating the cost. It is charged with the responsibility of sending for all those who are responsible for expenditures in the various departments of the Government and ascertaining from them what their needs may be. It is charged, further, with the responsibility of original research into the wisdom of the expenditure, and after investigation, to make recommendations to the President so that he may recommend to Congress what he believes to be necessary.

Up to the time of the organization of the Budget Bureau there was no such systematic effort to ascertain the needs of the Government or the cost of supplying the need. Every department head or Cabinet officer heretofore took his estimates from his bureau chiefs. The bureau chiefs prepared the original estimates. There was no revision of these estimates. They submitted them to the Cabinet officer. He seldom made changes in what the bureau chief submitted. To-day that is not the case. The bureau chiefs now submit to the Cabinet heads, and the Cabinet heads, through the departmental budget officer, revise those estimates. Then the Cabinet heads submit them to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who in turn makes his own personal investigation through his force to ascertain whether or not these estimates are what they ought to be. He has the power to review and reduce or increase. He has exercised it. I do not say that he has done all that may possibly be done in the future. He did not have the time or the organization. The work of the Bureau of the Budget is not as complete as it will be. It is not as complete as we expect it to be in the future. But with the organization that the director is now proposing I may say that in the future we are going to have a much more comprehensive examination of the annual estimates than we have ever had before. I can see the influence of the Budget Bureau upon the expenditures of the Government already. Many things have been kept out of the estimates that heretofore have been submitted; many things have been eliminated. As the work of the organization goes on and becomes more complete, I can see that we are going to have a very much better consideration of the financial affairs of the Government than we ever had before.

One of the plans that the Bureau of the Budget has inaugurated which is commendable and which will have a very large influence on the economy of expenditures in the various departments is the requirement of monthly statements of expenditures by the various departments showing whether or not they have exceeded their monthly allotments or the appropriations made by the Congress. When this is continued and each of the bureau chiefs and department heads realizes that he must give a monthly accounting of the state of his appropriation, they will all be much more careful not to incur deficiencies than they have ever been before.

The final responsibility, however, is on Congress. We can not and we ought not to surrender our constitutional duty. After all that the budget officer does, it remains with the Congress, through its Committees on Appropriations, to investigate every recommendation made by the budget officers.

This committee has done that to the best of its ability. We have not supposed that any recommendation made by the budget officer should be final. We can compel information which the budget officer can not get. We can put a man on the other side of the table and make him tell the story when he might not be willing to tell that story to some administrative officer whom he thinks is not much more important than he is; and to the extent that we have been able to do that we have done it religiously.

The Committee on Appropriations decided to do one thing which I think will meet with the commendation of the House. We decided in advance that we would not hear any argument from any chief of any department or any bureau in the Government for the restoration of any item that had been eliminated by the Director of the Budget, so that when the Director of the Budget makes a cut in the proposals submitted to him by the department chiefs, we take that cut as final, and we allow no man to come and argue for its restoration. We have, however, retained the right that we possess, as your spokesmen in the preparation of these bills, to go downward, not upward. In no case will you find that we have recommended in any bill that we propose for your consideration an item in excess of that recommended by the budget officer. You will find a great many items of reduction, but none of increase, and we have religiously refrained from making reductions where in the making of the reduction we know in advance that it would create a deficiency. We have adopted the policy that when we reach an item where we think a reduction ought to be made, if we have any doubt about the wisdom of making the reduction, we send for the man who has charge of the expenditure before we make the final figures, set him on the other side of the table, and take him into our confidence, calling his attention to the fact that he and we are the only people in the world who are looking after the man who is cleaning the street, laying the brick, digging the sewer, operating the plow, milking the cow, and we call his attention to the importance and necessity of visualizing the conditions that prevail throughout the country, and ask him to cooperate with us in a determination of the problem before us that will be just not only to the departments but to the people of the United States. In every case except one, I am proud to say, we have had the cooperation of these men who have come before us, and many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been eliminated from the recommendations of the budget officer because of the confidential relations that we have established in this way, by these men sitting across the table from us. We have endeavored and will continue to endeavor to establish a feeling of cooperation between the Committee on Appropriations and the departments of the Government. We want them to realize that we have but one object, and that object is proper economy in the conduct of the Government service, with the kind of efficiency that the people of the United States expect from their public servants. We have no ax to grind, no enemies to punish, no friends to reward. We have only one client, and that is the Nation. [Applause.]

We have made a thorough request for information on the permanent appropriations. I started in last August, shortly after I was selected by the House as chairman of the committee, to communicate with all the departments of the Government to ascertain just how the repealing of the permanent appropriations would affect the working of the various departments. I asked every department head, and as many of the bureau chiefs as I thought we ought to communicate with, just what effect the repeal of any permanent appropriation would have on the conduct of the Government in so far as it related to their activities, and we have accumulated a vast fund of very important information on this subject. We will compile that information in almost as concise form as this analysis of the appropriation bills. It has not been furnished to the Members of the House, because we have not come to a conclusion as to what we are going to do with it. It has been submitted to the chairman of each subcommittee for consideration by the subcommittee over which he presides. After we complete the work of reporting the appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 it is the purpose of the committee to take up the permanent appropriation question for final and definite consideration, taking the recommendations of the various subcommittees into the full committee, and putting into a single bill whatever we decide to do. We may not be able to repeal all the permanent appropriations, because the conditions may be such that we ought not to do so, but to the extent that it can be done to the advantage of the Government we propose to do it. There are a great many complications connected with it, a good many more than I myself thought there were. But with all the complications, we have for the first time tabulated a history and statement of the conditions surrounding each permanent appropriation. We have not decided what disposition we will make of them. We did not think it would be wise for us to undertake the task of repealing these permanent appropriations in fragments. We thought that if they were to be repealed it ought to be done in a single bill, which should be given careful consideration, and that no action should be taken on any bill affecting the permanent appropriations unless we were certain that our action would not in any wise embarrass the branch of the service affected by it. We promise you that when we get through with our appropriations work we will take up that question definitely and in the minutest detail, and will report back to you at a later date just what our conclusions are.

The appropriations for a single fiscal year are intended to cover the obligations of the Government entered into during that year under those appropriations. It must not be understood that the appropriations for a given fiscal year represent the expendtiures for that year, for sometimes contract and other obligations are created under appropriations during the fiscal year but not carried out and the balances are not expended.

Many times these balances are required to be expended in the succeeding fiscal year to satisfy those obligations; so that if you expect the appropriations always to measure the amount of the expenditures and to have one balance the other, you will be very much disappointed, because that can not be brought about under any circumstances unless you alter our entire accounting and fiscal system.

In my judgment, the appropriations should never exceed the revenues for any given year. Contract obligations under legislation should be constantly under review by Congress, and only such amounts appropriated as will meet the annual needs under those contracts.

It has frequently been the practice to make appropriations to cover contract obligations to continue over a series of years. The result is that Congress loses its right of review during all the contract period of that expenditure. The result is that frequently extravagance exists. If the man who has charge of the expenditures under the contract was compelled to come back to Congress for an additional appropriation every year, he would be compelled to disclose all the conditions connected with the expenditures in the previous year and justify his request for an additional appropriation. We hope that the House will sustain us in any effort that we may make to bring about this reform. Continuing appropriations to carry on contracts breed carelessness, extravagance, and waste and should not be continued. [Applause.] We hope that you will agree that they shall be discontinued.

Reduction of expenditures should be reflected in reduction of taxes. Not in the reduction of taxes five years from now, but immediately following a substantial reduction of expenditures from year to year. If we are to get reductions in any substantial sum, we ought to reduce them for the man who pays the bill and not make him wait. There is a further reason: If we reflect the reduction in expenditure in the reduction of taxes immediately following the reduction of expenditures we do two things—we lighten the burden of the taxpayer and we make the taxpayer a little happier and make him understand that he is being considered in connection with our work, and then in addition to that we have served notice on ourselves that we have no surplus funds out of which to pay for extravagant legislation. If we keep ourselves hard up by reflecting the savings in expenditures in the reduction of taxes, there will be many pieces of legislation which cost a lot of money that will not be enacted. [Applause.] My hope is that you gentlemen of the House will agree with me that you will be economical, that you will help us to save what we can, and that you will not feel it necessary to enact some other legislation to absorb the amount of savings because you know the money is there.

I would be glad if you could keep us so hard up all the time that when you have an extravagant notion in the form of legislation pending in the House that I can come in as chairman of the Appropriations Committee and say that we have not any money to meet the obligation, and be telling the truth. So if we join hands I think we can accomplish a great work.

Of course, it will never be possible for us to get down to prewar costs, for we must realize that we begin the expenditures now after we have met the fixed charges. These fixed charges are upon us and we can not eliminate them. One amount is $975,000,000 for interest on the public debt. Another amounts to about $370,000,000 for the reduction on principal of the debt; another is the charge for the care of those brave and patriotic men who have served in the various wars in which the country has been engaged. The estimates for the Pension Bureau are $254,000,000 and for the Veterans' Bureau $386,000,000. These four items alone now reach the stupendous sum of almost $2,000,000,000 a year. So the cost of the Government must begin at the end of these fixed charges, and if we reach the stage where we can get the rest of the Government down to a basis commensurate with prewar costs, we will still have a tremendous expenditure.

I would like to make this recommendation: The Army and the Navy to-day combined have on hand supplies that came down from the war valued variously at $3,000,000,000. Much of these supplies are being held in storage at a tremendous cost. Much of it is deteriorating as we hold it. I think the time has come when we ought to say to the Army and to the Navy, through legislation enacted by Congress, that all war supplies now on hand shall be declared surplus by law [applause] and placed on the market for sale. After we do that we should say that the Army and the Navy shall go before the civilian board created under the budget act and justify whatever reserve they may think they ought to retain. The declaration of surplus should be made by law, and then they should be compelled to justify the amount of the surplus which they should be permitted to carry in reserve.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman's statement as to the value of the property, $3,000,000,000—is that the present value?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the cost value. The public debt on November 30, 1921, amounted to $23,619,000,000, compared with $26,596,000,000 on August 31, 1919, or a reduction of $3,000,000,000 in a little over two years; a fairly good showing. Some of this, of course, has been paid out of the enormous Treasury balances that we had to carry during the war period and which we do not need longer to carry in such large amounts.

The public debt should be reduced $350,000,000 more during the year 1923 by the operation of the sinking fund, the franchise tax of the Federal reserve banks, and other funds available to be used for that purpose.

Treasury certificates outstanding on the 30th of November bearing 4½, 4¼, and up to 6 per cent interest amounted to $2,150,000,000, which is $600,000,000 less than the amount nine months ago. That amount should be reduced before the speech which I am making is uttered to less than $2,000,000,000. So that we are making progress even in the reduction of the public debt.

The estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year call for $167,000,000 more than the estimated receipts, but the reductions in the appropriations, if the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations are sustained in the House and the Senate, will more than bring the expenditures within the revenue. [Applause.]

The Government has securities amounting to $11,267,038,563.57, including many railroad bonds, $183,035,000 of farm loan bonds, and notes from foreign nations covered by the war loans. It seems to me to be very important that the legislation authorizing the adjustment and refunding of the foreign war loans should be enacted without delay. There ought to be some system put into effect that will enable the country to know just what the obligations of the foreign Governments to the United States are. To-day we have nothing but their I O U's, and neither the President of the United States nor the Secretary of the Treasury has any power to make any adjustment of any kind until legislation is enacted. Of course, so far as we are concerned in the House, that legislation has been enacted, but I think it may be well seen that it is of great importance that legislation should be enacted without delay.

We have 12 farm-loan banks, 23 joint-stock land banks, and 4,200 farm-loan associations. There are $520,000,000 of bonds of the farm-loan banks and joint-stock banks outstanding; $420,000,000 of those have been issued by the farm-loan banks and $100,000,000 by the joint-stock banks. The work of the farm-loan banks has been very successful. They have made profits which have enabled them to reduce the obligations of the banks to the Government by about $2,500,000. The original amount of money invested in these banks by the Government was $9,000,000. The present investment, due to the repayments, is about $6,500,000. The banks receive about $4,000,000 annually in interest on the loans they have made. They have $4,000,000 of surplus and undivided profits. The Farm Loan Board acts in the same relation to the farm-loan banks that the Federal Reserve Board sustains to the Federal reserve banks. The Farm Loan Board has the power to examine the accounts of the farm-loan banks. There is this one difference between the examination of the farm-loan banks and the banks under the Comptroller of the Currency, the national banks.

The examiner of the national banks has the power to say whether a piece of paper is of the value it purports to be. The examiner for the farm-loan banks takes the face of the paper without respect to its value. The farm loan bank securities, of course, are mortgages upon which they issue the bonds. If payments are not made within 90 days by the person to whom the loan is made the Farm Loan Board requires the farm loan bank to substitute some other mortgage for the mortgages against which the payments have not been made within the 90 days. The rate of interest charged on the bonds runs from 4½ to 5 per cent, and the rate of interest charged to the borrowers runs from 5½ to 6 per cent.

There should be a sinking fund in connection with the farm-loan bank system. The tremendous number of bonds that will be floated in the future, it seems to me, calls for this business principle. I called the attention of the Farm Loan Board to the advisability of a sinking fund when we had them before us for hearing. They agreed that we ought to begin it. They say they will undertake to bring that about. They say they have been compelled to take over on loans made to farmers over $200,000 worth of property. They have had the ordinary 4-year period of experience with mortgages, and have ascertained whether or not the security justifies the loan. They feel assured that the experience which they have just gone through justifies the farm loans thus far made. They have lost only $200, they say, on the sale of property taken over as the result of foreclosure proceedings, and most of the $200,000 worth of property taken has been disposed of. I think that is a very good showing.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I suspect the gentleman will also agree with this statement, that a comparison of the operations of farm-loan banks with private institutions of that kind as well as with similar institutions in other countries shows that our farm-loan system has been better managed, with smaller losses and smaller expense, than any similar operation either by a private company or by a Government-controlled company in other countries. In other words, our experiment has been the most scientifically safe of any ever indulged in.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to be able to join the gentleman in that statement. The investigation that I have made disclosed facts to me which give me more encouragement in connection with this activity than I ever had before. Fifty per cent of the applications for loans are denied, the board says, not because they have not the disposition to make the loans, not because they have not the facilities to make the loans, but because the security offered in 50 per cent of the cases is inadequate.

Of course, one can not expect them to make loans on inadequate securities. They have 4,200 associations. These associations, as well as the banks themselves, must be examined, and the closer the scrutiny we have over them the better it will be in the long run for the system. We have given the Farm Loan Board $10,000 additional appropriation in this bill for the purpose of enabling them to extend their examinations.

The information that we have in connection with the farm loan banks leads me to the conclusion that about $180,000,000 or $200,000,000 at the outside would be the limit in any one year beyond which the farm loan banks will be unable to go in their relief of the farmers of the country through loans. At any rate, $200,000,000 will be the limit under the present organization. First, it is physically impossible to put through more than a certain amount of work with a certain-sized organization, and with the present organization of 12 banks every loan that it is possible to put through is being put through. Then there must be taken into consideration the question of the ability of the public to absorb these securities, and these two problems combined will place a limit on the amount of farm loans that can be made through these banks.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman stated that $200,000,000 would be the limit. Does the gentleman mean per annum or the total amount?

Mr. MADDEN. Per annum, of course, I meant.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman stated there was a limit to the amount of securities to be absorbed by the public. What does he mean by that, please?

Mr. MADDEN. I mean that financial conditions of the country may be such that $200,000,000 in a year would be the limit that they would be able to go to without breaking the market.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does the gentleman know that the bonds of the joint-stock land banks, on which we authorize the payment of 5½ per cent of interest, have been largely sold by the purchasers at a premium of 3 per cent?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no doubt that when you make a 5½ interest rate you will sell at a premium where they are nontaxable; there is no question about that. I have not any desire, of course, to say anything except to help the system. I do not wish to discourage it; but, of course, there is one way in which you can expand, and that is by the creation of branch banks.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I know the gentleman did not intend to leave that impression, but I am fearful that some one not familiar with the system might be misled by his reference to the question of a sinking fund, and there might be left the impression that there is no provision now to safeguard or guarantee the payment at maturity of the bonds. Section 22 of the farm loan act absolutely makes all of these receipts a trust fund and sets out specifically how they may be used, and it is so handled that to a scientific certainty every bond will have ample funds to pay that bond when it falls due. The only way by which that will not be true would be something that is true in every kind of business concern, and that would be a defalcation, embezzlement, or something like that, but if these bonds are handled according to law, on a scientific, mathematical certainty there is ample provision made for the automatic retirement of every bond.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no intention of saying anything against the system——

Mr. WINGO. I know that the gentleman did not, but some gentleman might feel that the gentleman's suggestion is a reflection on the bonds, and I know the gentleman did not intend that.

Mr. MADDEN. Now the Internal-Revenue Bureau is asking for 1,200 additional auditors and other additional employees for the purpose of auditing back schedules that are still unaudited, some since 1917. In a deficiency appropriation act, approved December 15, the Committee on Appropriations recommended 600 of the 1,200 auditors, and the House and the Senate approved the recommendation. The cost of those 600 auditors and the supplementary force which they were to begin to put on as of the 1st of this month would be for the balance of this fiscal year, $1,792,000. The absorption of the 600 auditors could not be possible without training, and so they have to put them on 100 per month, so that they will have the first 100 of the 600 we allowed on for this month and during the period of the month they are going to school and taking the special training necessary to qualify them. On the 1st of July they will have the entire 600. They wanted 600 more to be put on after the 1st of next July. The reason they ask for these men is that to-day they have 9,000 unaudited corporation schedules, some running back as far as 1917, and they have 160,000 claims pending for reimbursement for overpayment, all of which ought to be promptly and properly adjudicated. About $30,000,000 a month is being collected from back taxes under the audits of schedules that have been filed for years gone by. They said that if we gave them 600 additional men for the balance of this fiscal year that they would be able to increase the amount from $357,000,000 a year to $557,000,000 a year, and that by the adjudication of those claims for reimbursement, many of which they owe instead of being entitled to reimbursement, they will probably be able to cover in $200,000,000 more receipts a year, making it $757,000,000. The committee, however, went very carefully into this problem and finally concluded that after these 600 auditors are absorbed in the service they would be able to make rapid progress.

The next 600 would not be of any consequence for six months. It is better not to get too many people into the service and make it top-heavy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This same matter came before the Committee on Ways and Means at a time when we had more to do with these appropriations than now, and the committee came to the conclusion very much the same that the Committee on Appropriations has reached that a certain proportion of these clerks might be needed, but not near as much as they imagine. In the first place, as the gentleman, of course, is aware, the excess-profits tax will only apply for this year, and that is the tax that occasioned most of this back-tax difficulty. Then, in addition to that we made provision in the last revenue bill which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury and the taxpayer to get together in an agreement and make a final settlement in those matters which were in dispute which we believe would do away with many disputes now existing between the Treasury Department and the taxpayer.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very glad to have had the statement of the gentleman from Iowa. The Committee on Appropriations think that the 600 men which they are already authorized to put on will meet the needs and we hope will adjust these claims rapidly and without loss of time and bring in the revenue that they anticipate. They certainly ought to have the revenue.

Prior to the war the cost per hundred dollars for collecting the internal revenue was $3. It is now about 72 cents; but as the collections decrease in volume it is expected to go to $1.13 in 1923, and a little later, as the revenues decrease, to $1.80. As I said, they had 160,000 claims. The number of income-tax returns every year that have to be dealt with are 9,000,000, a tremendous volume of work, more than anybody can imagine. Duplicate payments have been made at different times, due to the fact that the collectors of internal revenue in the various sections of the country when a schedule was filed never read it, but transmitted it to Washington. Frequently it happens where the adjustments were authorized the taxpayer made his reduction on his schedule, on his next return, for any money he thought he overpaid, and while the case was in process of adjustment here it was deducted there and two payments for reimbursement were made in some instances. But that question has been eliminated now, and there is no further trouble about it, so we are informed.

Now we come to the prohibition question. For the current fiscal year the appropriation amounts to $7,500,000. The amount asked through the budget officer in this bill is $10,000,000. The amount recommended by the committee is $9,250,000. They ask for 750 additional agents. They have a field force now numbering 1,138, with 51 directors. They wanted these 750 additional field men and 153 additional clerks. They recommended increases of compensation for men from the top to the bottom of the line.

The increased compensation recommended amounted to about $550,000 for the fiscal year 1923. The Committee on Appropriations adopted the policy at the beginning of its consideration of the problems that you submitted to it to not under any circumstances recommend any increased compensation to anybody anywhere, and we have not done it. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LONDON. Was not the recommendation of an increase for this particular department made with the object of preventing temptation by giving the employee a proper salary?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say in reply to the gentleman that they said that, namely, that the increased compensation would prevent the possibility of yielding to temptation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. SNELL. You spoke of 51 regional directors. That is one for each State and Territory. Does each one of these men draw exactly the same pay?

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir. They draw a little more in New York and Chicago than in other places.

Mr. SNELL. The director in New York State gets $5,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I think so. That is the limit. The pay runs from $4,000 to $5,000.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] says they wanted to take these men out from temptation. Well, the work of a prohibition inspector is the same as the work of a policeman exactly. There is no difference. His work is the enforcement of the law. And, as far as I am concerned, I want to see the law enforced properly, but I do not want to see any sum of money appropriated by the Congress and given to anybody in any branch of the Government service in lump sum, with the right of that person to make such compensations as he may think proper, regardless of what compensation is being paid in other branches of the public service. I want to see the prohibition service treated like every other branch of the Government service, no less and no more, but treated fairly and justly, and every person in it paid a rate that accords with the rates paid for like service in every other branch of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Do we exercise any control at all on the appropriations we make in lump sum?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we do in this.

Mr. MANN. In the compensation which is paid from it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we have a limitation in this bill that prohibits the payment of any compensation to anybody in any class more than payment for similar classes of work.

Mr. MANN. There is not any other similar work.

Mr. MADDEN. It is similar to the extent that it is like. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Very like.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what this temptation is that this increased compensation was to prevent?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I am not a mind reader.

Mr. WALSH. I thought the effect of the law was to encourage and stimulate temptation.

Mr. MADDEN. I reach my conclusion against the increase in compensation on the theory that if a man is crooked a little increased compensation will not make him straight. [Applause.] Now, we therefore have reached the conclusion that instead of giving them $10,000,000 that we give them $9,250,000, and we hope the House will concur in that recommendation. And I may say, in this connection, that the $9,250,000 is satisfactory to the prohibition end of the enforcement section of the Government.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman have the figures on the receipts of the Government in fines?

Mr. MADDEN. About $2,500,000 for this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I will have to take a little more time. I am sorry.

Most of the distilleries in the United States are closed, I suppose. A great many distilleries that are closed from the right to make spirits are still used as bonded warehouses. The result is that we have 900 gaugers and watchmen in the various bonded warehouses, 800 of whom could be dismissed from the service if the Government would adopt a policy of centralizing the places in which liquors could be stored. I suggest the unwisdom of continuing to keep 900 people at a cost of a million dollars additional annually over what it ought to cost in order to watch places in which spirits are stored when you can reduce the number of places to five or six and reduce the cost at least a million dollars a year by the dismissal of men whose services would no longer be needed; and this could not hurt anybody, whether he is in favor of prohibition or against prohibition. This is a straight business consideration of the problem without any respect whatever to whether a man is a prohibitionist or not. As a Member of the House of Representatives, sworn to obey the law and to enforce it, I am for law observance, and to the extent that I have responsibilities placed upon me as the chairman of this committee, I will carry this responsibility out under the law, no matter how I feel personally about it. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to offer an amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a bill pending, I will say to the gentleman. The Committee on Appropriations did suggest that I prepare an amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Under the Holman rule, looking to carrying out the suggestion which the gentleman has just made.

Mr. MADDEN. In looking over the situation I am afraid I shall not be able to do it, but I will talk with the members of the committee about that. But there is a bill pending and on the calendar covering that, and I think we ought to give it early consideration and get it out of the way.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How many gallons of whisky do we make now?

Mr. MADDEN. There are 42,500,000 gallons in bond now. I do not know how many they are making.

Now as to the temporary pay increase for the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service, it amounts to $1,248,000. As you will recall, in 1920 Congress passed an act giving increased compensation for a definite period to the men in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey. That law, providing for this increased compensation, expires by limitation on the 30th of June. The Committee on Appropriations in making this recommendation have eliminated the increased compensation as to those activities that are provided for in this bill, and they amount to $1,248,000.

The following services have included the following amounts in their items in the Budget to provide for continuing temporary increases in pay under the act of May 18, 1920, which expire by limitation of law on June 30, 1922:

Coast and Geodetic Survey	$90,750.00
Coast Guard	783,990.00
Public Health Service	491,480.00
Marine Corps	1,178,865.60
Navy	17,856,373.00
Army	13,978,092.00
Total	34,379,550.60

We are eliminating all those sums from our recommendations to the House. We hope that the House will take into account the importance and necessity of not reenacting any law that will continue these high increases beyond that period for which the existing law prevails. There will be legislation offered, and I want from time to time to call the attention of the House to the importance of watching these things and stopping them. There is not a man in the Army—that is, an officer in the Army or in the Navy; I will not say the Coast Guard, but in any of the other services where promotions come from the military standpoint—that has not been promoted out of sight since the war closed, and they do not need any increased pay, and they ought not to get it. [Applause.] There may be some justification for a bonus to the man who is getting $60 a month in the custodial service of the Government, but there can be no justification for giving a bonus to a man who is getting high pay under a higher rank than he ever held before and who can retire with three-quarters pay at the end of his service.

So I hope that while we are considering these problems of economy we will not think alone of the men who are on the pay roll, but that we will think of the man on the farm, the man in the mill, the man on the street, who when he gets to be 45 years of age has reached the limit of his capacity for employment, and who loses every rainy hour of every rainy day of all his existence, and who works only six months in a year, and gets small pay when he works, and can not go on anybody's pension roll. These are the men we ought to visualize when we are making up these pay rolls.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I have been told that many men in the Army who went in as second lieutenants and who, at the rate of promotion before the war, might now become first lieutenants, owing to the rapidity of promotion, are now captains, majors, or colonels, with the increase of salary that goes with those promotions. May I ask whether the gentleman knows that to be the fact?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. The man who now, to-day, graduates from the Military Academy as second lieutenant to-morrow becomes first lieutenant, and they have 600 colonels in the Army who were promoted since the war closed, and many of the officers in the Army and Navy have been going up rank by rank and are still commanding this increased compensation as a bonus.

Mr. MANN. I have been told that some of the officers of the Army and the Navy have become dizzy owing to the rapidity of their promotion.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and we ought to stop it. One thing we are going to try to do, as far as the Appropriations Committee can. We propose to see if we can not cut down the number of these people. Instead of carrying a force of 14,000 or 15,000 high ranking officers in the Army, with only 125,000 men, instead of giving them a bonus to enable them to stay in the Army, we propose to see if we can not put some of them out.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman will admit that we have the same number of second lieutenants.

Mr. MADDEN. We have not any second lieutenants. They are all made first lieutenants the day after they are graduated.

Mr. CRAGO. We have the same number of first lieutenants then and captains who are trying to get along on their low pay.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not stay second lieutenants more than about 15 minutes. The men who came out of the Military Academy in time for the war are generals now or next door to it.

Mr. CRAGO. Surely the gentleman is exaggerating in that statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I know, of course, that the gentleman is an enthusiast for the military establishment, and perhaps I ought not to deny whatever he says. I generally get near the facts.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. I wonder if the gentleman recognizes the fact that these men also have special privileges at the commissary department over the ordinary individual in the purchase of the necessities of life?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely they have.

Now, let me get along. We have the question of the $240 bonus for the civil employees of the Government. That has been eliminated from the estimates submitted by the budget, and of course we have eliminated it, but it may be that before we get through with the consideration of these bills the House will want to give some consideration to the question. If they do, it will be time enough to do that after we find out just what we ought to do, and we do not propose to bring in any recommendation for the payment of a bonus of any kind until the end of the consideration of the appropriation bills, and then we will see what the attitude of the House is; and we hope you will agree with us on that.

In the Bureau of Printing and Engraving there is a condition under which if we put in power presses we could save a very large amount of money every year. The power press does four and one-half times as much as a hand press, but under the law that has been in existence the department has not been able to put in power presses except upon condition that they retain the plate printers regardless of what presses may have been installed. I have introduced a bill which I put into the basket yesterday, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to install power presses and to eliminate any expenditures connected with the operation of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving resulting from the substitution of these superior machines. [Applause.] It will be for the House to consider. We are not carrying any legislation in this bill. Wherever we disclose the necessity for legislation we are going to call the attention of the House to it, and as far as I can I will introduce bills and have them go to the proper committees and then urge the proper committees to report these bills and place them on the calendar, and we will help you to pass them.

The Public Health Service facilities are very much superior to what they were. I will not undertake to go into the details, but you will find in the hearings a most comprehensive tabulated statement of the facilities afforded to the men who need care. I think it shows that we have 7,900 and some odd surplus beds. The statement shows in tabulated form in parallel columns the number of beds for tubercular patients, the number for neuropsychiatric patients, the number of general hospital patients, the number of those patients that are in the hospitals to-day, the number that we expect to have when we reach the peak, the number of contract hospitals, and the number of facilities that we will have when we complete the work of construction under the allotment of the $18,600,000 appropriation that was made some time ago.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did any evidence come to the gentleman's committee that there were any considerable number of men who were not receiving reasonable treatment at the present time?

Mr. MADDEN. The testimony which comes to us is that every person who asks for treatment and is entitled to it receives it.

Mr. SNELL. Except in some extreme individual cases.

Mr. MADDEN. There may be a case here and there where some poor, unfortunate man has been shell shocked and is nervous and would be restless anyway, and he might have complained.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is satisfied that at the present time they are all being taken care of as well as they can be?

Mr. MADDEN. I am satisfied that they are.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. MADDEN. I have a statement here showing in summary the amount of the appropriations for the present year, the recommendations in the budget for next year, and the increase or decrease. I would like to put that statement into the RECORD in connection with my speech.

Summary of comparative statement showing the appropriations for the fiscal year 1922 (as of Nov. 1, 1921), the estimates for the fiscal year 1923 (as stated in the alternative budget), and the increase or decrease in the estimates as compared with the appropriations.

I have not much time to go into the bill in detail, but we can go into that when we come to it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In connection with the work of the Public Health Service, I noticed in the hearings a reference to the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board. Have the appropriations for that work been done away with?

Mr. MADDEN. They have been done away with for next year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am very glad to hear it. It seems to me they ought to be in the Public Health Service.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I want to make this suggestion in regard to the work of the Appropriations Committee. It seems to me in the consideration of problems that have come before us that a great deal can be accomplished by a rearrangement of the appropriation paragraphs by which sums of money are carried in the various appropriation bills. Some of these paragraphs are infinite in their detail and carry very small sums, while others are general and carry exceedingly large sums. Some of them express the instrumentalities for carrying on a given function without any reference to the function that is to be accomplished, and others express the function without any reference to the instrumentalities for which the money is to be expended in accomplishing that function. There is practically no uniformity of expression. For example, the main appropriation for the customs service is carried in one paragraph in one sum of $11,300,000 and occupies four or five lines. The appropriations for the Bureau of Fisheries are carried in 57 paragraphs, aggregating $1,233,100, extending over five or six pages. Many of the smaller paragraphs and smaller sums now in appropriation bills could be consolidated and merged without in any way affecting the control of Congress over the funds. Many larger sums could be subdivided and make easier the task of inquiring into them.

Such a rearrangement, however, involves the accounting system of the Government and should only be made after the Comptroller General, who has charge of prescribing the forms of accounting, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, whose duty it is to prepare the estimates of appropriations, have made a study of the situation and evolved a comprehensive and definite plan for the form of the appropriating paragraphs and the verbiage to be carried in them, in order that they may accomplish the purpose which Congress contemplates when it makes the appropriation. Of course, the Appropriations Committee could do the work very well, but there is a long line of comptroller's decisions on the language now employed in the bills, and if we were in a position where we could shape the accounting system it would be possible for the Appropriations Committee to adjust them, but inasmuch as we are not able to regulate the accounting system we thought it would be wise to call the matter to your attention, so that you may realize that we are thinking about the problems that confront Congress in its work and also the problem that affects the Nation.

At this point I wish, for the information of the House, to give you a few figures as to the general classification of appropriations for 1922 and the estimates for 1923 as contained in the budget to show the principal large objects of appropriations and the estimates.

In the appropriations for 1922 the interest on the public debt was $975,000,000. The estimate is $975,000,000. The sinking fund and other reductions in principal of public debt in the appropriation for 1922 were $387,942,200, and the estimate $369,338,800, or a decrease of $18,603,400. Military activities of the War Department, including the support of the Army, $345,712,837.41 for 1922, and in the estimate for 1923, $310,638,709.47, or a decrease of $35,074,127.94. Navy Department appropriations for 1922 were $426,191,519.37. The estimates for 1923 are $425,952,367.13, or a decrease of $239,152.24. Bureau of Pensions appropriations for 1922 were $266,830,920. The estimates for 1923 are $254,117,280, or a reduction of $12,713,640. The appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau was $230,573,620. The estimates for 1923 are $385,921,702, or an increase of $155,348,082. The Shipping Board for 1922 was $73,959,000, and the estimates for 1923 are $50,501,500, or a reduction of $23,457,500. The Post Office Department appropriation for 1922 was $577,334,257.55, and the estimates for 1923 are $579,650,066, or an increase of $2,315,808.45. The increased compensation, the bonus, for 1922 is estimated at $35,000,000. It is not recommended for 1923. All other appropriations, including those for the Congress, the courts, and the executive departments not enumerated in the above, amounted to $453,356,159.68, and the estimates for 1923 are $458,293,234.93, or an increase of $4,937,075.25.

The grand total of the appropriations for 1922 is $3,771,900,514.01, and the grand total recommended for 1923 is $3,809,413,659.53, a net increase of $37,513,145.52.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much reduction is there in the amount recommended for what you call all the other departments?

Mr. MADDEN. There is $37,000,000 increase in the grand total, including the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. MANN. So outside of the military, the Navy Department, there is no reduction under the new budget.

Mr. MADDEN. A deficiency for 1922 of $65,000,000 was granted to the Veterans' Bureau in the deficiency act of December 15, 1921, bringing this total to $295,573,620. A further deficiency will be necessary to complete this fiscal year, so that the increase shown in this table is larger than the actual situation will be when full provision is made for this fiscal year.

I do not know of anything more that I ought to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION. I notice the estimate for 1923 for the Navy shows a decrease of less than a million dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. Two hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars in the total of regular annual and permanent appropriations for the Navy.

Mr. ROBSION. Evidently that does not take into consideration the probable reduction of armament?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the estimates of the Director of the Budget that he recommends in every department a very large number of increases in pay.

Mr. MADDEN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I understand from my colleague that so far those have been eliminated.

Mr. MADDEN. They have all been eliminated and will be.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the budget also that in a very great number of cases where the appropriation for the current year was, say, for instance, $100,000, the estimate for the next year is, say, $95,000. Everyone knows that, as the usual thing, the whole appropriation is not used in most cases, because it is not possible to get at it with mathematical exactness. Is that the way the reduction is made, where there is reduction throughout the estimates—cutting it down fine upon the supposition that one could cut off a few thousand dollars, and then, perchance, get a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. That is not the way we reach our conclusions. I do not know how the budget officer reached his.

Mr. MANN. I did not notice in the estimates that there were very many items of expenditure cut out.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I think not, but we are cutting a good many of them.

Mr. MANN. I have the greatest regard for the budget officers, but I can not see any very great difference in the estimate of this year and the estimate of last year, except the transposition of items from one place to another, the items being the same.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understood it, the Committee on Appropriations under the present plan has eliminated, or has intended to eliminate, the lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. DOWELL. I notice in this bill a number of apparently lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true. We did not intend to eliminate them.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to inquire about one item on page 4, in the Liberty Loan Register's Annex Building, a lump sum of $100,000. Is it not possible for the committee to arrive at a nearer accurate number of employees necessary than to compel leaving it a lump-sum appropriation of $100,000 for one department of the Treasury?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we have economized on the public debt service of the Government very considerably. As I recall, the consolidation of the work in connection with the Liberty loan work, instead of having triplicate audits, they have reduced it to one audit; $560,000 was eliminated from the appropriation by the department itself. Three hundred thousand dollars more have been eliminated by the recommendation of this committee.

Mr. DOWELL. And as I understand it, the committee has an itemized statement of exactly what is necessary in this department as it now is?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it necessary on top of that to appropriate $100,000 for this one department in addition to what is itemized and found to be necessary by the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a transfer. I can not recall the facts about it now, but I shall look them up and give the gentleman the details of it.

Mr. DOWELL. It seems to me that a large waste occurs in lump-sum appropriations, and that they ought to be cut as much as possible.

Mr. MADDEN. We have placed limitations upon the expenditure of many lump-sum appropriations in the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. But that has been fixed only so far as the amount to be paid to one individual is concerned. The committee has not limited the number at all from this item. They may employ as many as they please.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I can give the gentleman the details of that so that he will be satisfied, but I do not recall them now.

Mr. Chairman, I shall have to yield the floor at this point, and thank the members of the committee very much. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is the first appropriation bill which has been reported to the House under the new budget plan of procedure in the preparation and presentation of appropriation bills. Heretofore appropriation bills have been presented to Congress carrying various items of appropriation in each bill for various departments of the Government, and it has been practically impossible to determine what each department of the Government is spending. It has been necessary to examine all of the various appropriation bills and pick out the various items of appropriation carried therein in order to know just what was appropriated for a particular department. Under the new plan bills will be reported for each department, and for the independent offices, and thus enable the Congress and the country to know quickly and readily just what amount is being appropriated for a particular department without the necessity of the investigation to which I have referred. This is a plan which I am satisfied will meet with the very hearty and cordial approval not only of the Members of Congress but of the entire country.

It is only fair to say that this plan of procedure in the preparation and presentation of appropriation bills was put into effect by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who deserves the entire credit for its inauguration. [Applause.] The gentleman from Illinois has always been a close and thorough student of governmental affairs, but since becoming chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he has devoted a very earnest study to better methods of preparing appropriation bills and also to the importance of giving to the individual Members of Congress and to the country full and complete information as to the amount of money which was being appropriated for the various governmental activities. I am sure that I voice the sentiment of every Member of Congress when I say that Congress is greatly indebted to him for this plan of procedure. [Applause.]

It is not my purpose to enter into any discussion of the details of this bill. The committee has conducted lengthy hearings, and has given very thorough consideration to every item of appropriation.
